THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.

Deacon & Peterson, Publishers,
NUMBER SIXTY-SIX SOUTH THIRD ST.

Two Dollars Per Annum, In Advance.
THREE DOLLARS IF NOT PAID IN ADVANCE.

DEACON, PETERSON, } EDITORS AND PROPRIETORS.

A FAMILY NEWSPAPER: NEUTRAL IN POLITICS.

{ CLUBS.—FOR TERMS TO CLUBS, SEE PROPOSITION ON THIRD PAGE. }

DEVOTED TO MORALITY, PURE LITERATURE, FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC NEWS, AGRICULTURE, THE COMMERCIAL INTEREST, SCIENCE, ART AND AMUSEMENT

VOLUME XXXII. PHILADELPHIA, SATURDAY, JULY 31, 1852. WHOLE NO. 1618.

Choice Poetry.

THE MINER'S DREAM.

I lie, all cold and lonely,
Beneath a tree at night,
When the stars are shining only
And the glow-worm gives his light;
I sleep where the tall trees quiver,
And my restless memories roam
Away from the golden river,
To my childhood's happy home!

The golden dawn is flowing
Away from my troubled sight,
And my heart with hope is beating,
As I see the cottage light:
My father's out before me,
My home in happiness know I dwell,
For the shouts of life come o'er me,
When no pain my bosom felt.

I see my mother smiling,
With a faint, uneasy mirth,
And my father's hands are piling
The faggots on the hearth;
And they whisper over lowly,
And I think I hear my name—
It was breathed in accents lowly,
And a tear-drop with it came!

The golden sands are gleaming
In the ruddy light of dawn,
The golden sun is beaming,
And my nightly dream is gone;
But ever and forever
In my dreams my wild thoughts roam,
Away from the golden river,
To my childhood's happy home!

Carpet-Bag.

Original Novelet.

THE CURSE OF CLIFTON.

A TALE OF
EXPIATION AND REDEMPTION

WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST,
BY MRS. EMMA D. E. N. SOUTHWORTH,
AUTHOR OF "THE DISCARDED WIFE," "VIVIENNE AND MAGDALENE," "SHADOWDARK," "THE DISMARRIED DAUGHTER," ETC., ETC., ETC.

[Entered according to the Act of Congress, by Deacon & Peterson, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.]

CHAPTER II.

CLIFTON AND THE BEAUTIES.

"Against the cliffs
Beat but there not where the emotion stands! The mountainous
Strikes on the granite column, and all runs
Group shadowy round it. Anonymous.

A most portentous trial was there now—
Woman's bright eyes and dazzling snowy bosom. Moore.

The servants had been so terribly overdone and overdressed, and the roasts so deucedly washed and gummed by the tempest and fire of the preceding evening, that the travellers found the greatest difficulty in pursuing their journey, often having to turn back miles on this road, to take another way, and often being obliged to search leagues up and down the course of a river, to find a practicable ford.

Therefore it was near eight-bell when they aroused the last of their drowsy drowned money-takers, and demanded into the wooded valley that lay between them and White Cliff. A winding road through the woods brought them to the house. The full moon was rising East of the cliffs, and casting their shadow back across the house and lawn. The mansion was a lofty edifice of white stone, with a centre building and two projecting wings. The tall trees surrounding the buildings, the lofty cliffs rising behind them, the dark shadow falling on all; the hour, the silence, and the solitude, gave an air of refreshing coolness and deep repose to the scene. On turning an angle of the building, they saw the drawing-room windows open, and the light from them gleaming out cheerfully across that part of the lawn. At that moment a servant, waiting at the hall door, came down to take their horses.

"All well at home, Sandy?" inquired Captain Clifton, as he dismounted, and threw him the reins.

"Hurrah, sir! All very well," replied the man, touching his hat.

Captain Clifton led the way up into the hall adjoining the drawing-room, where they were met by an old gentleman, who seized both of Clifton's hands, and shook them slowly and cordially, as he said, dropping each word separately, and with a solemn, venerable emphasis—

"Why—my—dear—boy—how glad I am—to see you!"

"And I am very happy to be with you, sir; and to find you looking so well. Allow me to introduce to your acquaintance—Lieutenant Fairfax, of my company," said Captain Clifton, presenting his friend.

"Glad to see him! Glad to see Mr. Fairfax! Glad to welcome any friend of my nephew's to Clifton. How do you do, sir? Know your relative, Lord Fairfax, of Greenway Courthouse. Excessively fond of hunting. Kept bachelor's hall. Very great mistake that—very! Hope you won't follow his example! Fine man, however, and I honor his memory! Come in, sir! come in! Come in, Archy! My—dear—boy,—I'm—so—del—ighted to see you!"

Whenever he spoke to his nephew, he seemed to dwell upon each separate syllable with a cordiality impossible to describe.

He was a large, old gentleman, clothed in a fresh, fragrant suit of pale blue linen, with his hair as white as cotton, his flesh, a very complexion, fine teeth, clear, kind, blue eyes, making a most refreshing picture of simplicity, cheerfulness, and cleanliness of soul and body in old age. He was of a sanguine temperament, and under great provocation, could get into a passion, too. And what old farmer of a family, with two grown daughters, and a young wife, all under eighteen years of age, and all beauties, has not enough combustible material to burn the house down, or cut his own temper on fire?—yet such was the kindness of his heart, that even when in violent anger, stamping up and down the floor, grasping desperately at his own white temple locks with both hands, and vociferating in stentorian tones,—it was all, as Frank afterwards said, shooting with blank cartridges—he never said a word, or did a thing, to wound a single soul.

"I trust the ladies are all well, sir," said Captain Clifton, as he followed his uncle.

"Yes—yes—that is to say, Carry is well, but not well pleased. She suspected you yesterday—didn't consider the storm any excuse for your absence. Ah! you dog—you and dog—at your age would I have kept a lady waiting? Nay, would I do it now? But come, shall I present you to the ladies now, or do you prefer first the refreshment of the bath, and a change of dress? Your own not yet arrived? Baggage not arrived this morning by the wagon, and has been conveyed to your rooms?"

"Oh, a change of dress, by all means!" suggested Frank.

"Dandy—DANDY!" exclaimed the old gentleman, raising his strong voice, till the servant appeared. "Show Mr. Fairfax to General Washington's room."

General Washington had slept one night at Clifton, and from that time to this, the room he occupied has been "General Washington's room."

The servant conducted Mr. Fairfax up stairs. And then the old gentleman, turning to his nephew, took his hands again, and said,

"My dear boy, once more I must say, I'm—so—glad—to—see you! You are at home, you know. So go and find your room, and ring and give your orders, my son, for you are so. And I will go and let the ladies know that you have come, though I dare say they know it already."

And shaking his hands, he let them go and turned slowly away.

Half-an-hour sufficed the young gentlemen to make themselves presentable. At the end of which time they descended the stairs, and were met in the hall by old Mr. Clifton, who ushered them into the drawing-room.

This apartment was a most delightful Summer room. It was very spacious, occupying the whole first floor of one of those irregular village of the house. The ceiling was lofty, its walls were covered with panel white paper, and the floor of white oak was waxed and polished to an ivory smoothness. On three sides were tall windows, reaching to the floor, and opening out upon the piazza or the lawn, and draped with snowy, flowing curtains. On the fourth side you had an open fire-place, whitened inside, and having on its marble hearth, an elaborate vase of lilies, whose fragrance filled the air. The walls were adorned with tall mirrors, and with choice paintings, all of a cool, refrigerating character, such as: An Alpine Scene, A Green Forest Glade, with Deer Reposing, A Mountain Lake, A Shaded Pond, with Cows, A Farm Yard in a Snow Storm, etc. A piano stood at the farthest end of the room. A harp reclined near it. A few marble-topped stands and tables, scattered over with rare prints, books, objets, bijouterie, etc., stood at convenient distances. A lady's elegant work-table, with its comfy tribes, was a pleasing feature in the picture. Sofas, chairs, ottomans, and lounging chairs, "fitted to a wish for study or repose" were everywhere at hand.

Through the open windows came the evening wind, laden with the fragrance of flowers, the murmur of falling waters, the whisper of leaves, and the cheery chirp of insects—those night songsters who begin when the birds go to sleep nature's younger child. While from the open windows could be dimly seen the tall shadowy trees, the towering white cliffs, and, in the distance, a band of that great river which took its rise here, and which there sleeping among the dark green hills, with the moon shining full upon it, looked a resplendent mountain lake, shutting back the moonbeams from its bosom in rays of dazzling light. The whole effect of the room and the scene was delightfully cooling and refreshing.

When Mr. Clifton conducted his guests into this saloon, it was occupied by three young ladies, who, immediately on their entrance, seem to resolve them; and whom, in presenting his visitors, Mr. Clifton severally named to, My wife, Mrs. Clifton,—my daughter, Miss Clifton, and my second daughter, Xaleine.—Captain Clifton, in turn, saluted his aunt and cousins. Miss Clifton, his betrothed, received him with cold hauteur.

So, these were the beauties—and beautiful, passing beautiful, they were indeed, though differing from each other in beauty, as "one star differs from another in glory." But let me describe them.

Carolyn Clifton is tall and elegantly proportioned, and moves with high-bred dignity. Her features are Grecian—her complexion is dazzlingly fair, save when the pure rich blood mantles in her cheek, and crimsons the short and scornful lip. Her eyes are blue, and half-veiled by their fair lashes, as in disdain of aught that might seek their glance. Her fair hair is carried up from her forehead, and falls in bright ringlets on her shoulders, and in a rich braid behind, adding an intellectual and queenly grace to the proud head. The costume of that day closely resembled the prevailing mode of our own. Miss Clifton wore a dress of pale blue silk, made low in the neck, with a long-waisted stomacher, tight sleeves reaching to the elbows, and ample flowing skirt. The neck was trimmed with a full of deep lace, then called a "tucker," and answering to the present berthe. The tight half-sleeves were trimmed at the elbows by deep lace ruffles, shading the arm. A necklace of large strung pearls around her throat, a bracelet of the same on her arm, and a pearl-headed pin run through the Grecian knot of ringlets at the back of her head, completed her toilet. She carried in her hand and toyed carelessly with a beautiful fan of marabout feathers. She was the daughter of the first Mrs. Clifton, of Clifton, a fair, proud Maryland lady, one of the haughty Gowens, who thought long enough to enquire by precept and example, the double portion of family arrogance Carolyn Clifton had inherited from both sides of her house. Miss Clifton had "received her education" at a first-class "Ladies' Institute" at Richmond.

Xaleine, the younger sister, was about fourteen years of age, but well grown and full-formed for her years. She was the daughter of the second Mrs. Clifton, a beautiful West Indian Creole, who died in giving her life. She had the snowy skin and damask cheek of her father's fair race, and the glittering black hair and sparkling black eyes of her Creole mother. Her dress was of plain white muslin, with short sleeves and low neck, and coral neck-lace, which well-set off the exceeding brilliancy of her complexion. Xaleine was home for the mid-summer holidays.

Mrs. Clifton, of Clifton, Georgia!

"Yes, she is indeed the most beautiful woman in the whole world," exclaimed Fairfax, to himself, as he turned from the fair and dignified Carolyn—the brilliant and sparkling Xaleine to the dark and graceful Georgia. She is of medium height. Her complexion is a rich, dark, uniform olive, her very cheeks being of the same hue, but so transparent clear, that that which would mar the perfection of another face, adds deeper beauty to hers. Yes! the delicate bloom of the fair Carolyn, and the bright damask blush of the brilliant Xaleine, are common place beside the perfect beauty of the pure, clear olive cheek of the dark Georgia. Her hair is intensely black, with depths under depths of darkness, lurking in the labyrinths of irregular curls that cluster around, and throw so deep a shadow over her witching face. Her eyebrows are black and arched. Her eyelashes are long, black, and drooping. Her eyes are—pause—I have been trying to think of something to which her wondrous eyes may compared, for darkness, profundity and power. Midnight! No, her eyes are darker, stiller, and more solemn yet. Thunder clouds! No, for her eyes are more stormy and impending still—and their electric smoke is silent as it is fatal. In short, her eyes resemble nothing but themselves. Her dress is of black gauze, over black silk, made high to veil her neck, and finished with a narrow black lace, within which gleams around her throat a necklace of jet and gold. She wears no other jewelry. A large black lace mantilla is carelessly thrown over all. When she moves her every movement is waiting grace—her motion might be set to music. And when she sits still she is so still, and dark, and beautiful!—and something else, besides, that the game superlatives something like the fascination and terror one feels in looking down the depths of a dark chasm.

She was the daughter of a portrait painter in Richmond, and this was what Captain Archer Clifton, in his arrogance, called humble parentage. Mr. Clifton had met her under the following circumstances: On finally withdrawing his eldest daughter from school, he wished, before carrying her home, to have her portrait taken, and went for that purpose to the studio of Mr. Feller, portrait and miniature painter, where he chanced to see her for the first time, the artist's beautiful child, Georgia. He took so strong a fancy to this bewitching creature, that he delayed his departure—prolonging his stay in the city for three weeks, at the end of which, besides, the accomplished Miss Clifton, with her elegant wardrobe, splendid jewels, costly presents, and finished portrait—he took home the artist's daughter as the fourth Mrs. Clifton, of Clifton, much to the indignation of the haughty Carolyn, who never ceased to treat her beautiful young step-mother with scorn and contempt.

Supper was announced, and the old gentleman, rising, requested his nephew to lead in his wife, while he, himself, took the arm of his eldest daughter, and left Xaleine to Mr. Fairfax. They crossed the hall and entered a large and pleasant dining-room, where stood an elegant table, laid with a damask table-cloth, set out with silver plate, and Sevres' porcelain, and laden with all the luxuries of the season. Waiters of parted dress and subdued mien in attendance.

"I assure you, Miss Xaleine, that contrast is all the seasoning of existence—and this is a high seasoning. For yesterday we sat down to our supper off of pewter plates, on a bare board, in a mean hut, in company with rude mountaineers, and to-night we sit at the elegant table of Clifton, surrounded with beautiful, refined, and accomplished ladies," said Frank, as he handed his lively companion into her chair, and took the seat by her side.

The sprightly Xaleine laughed, and said she doubted whether he would find more substantial or savory fare here than he got at the mountain hut.

After all were seated, and all served, the conversation became general and vivacious—old Mr. Clifton being evidently "the life of the company." He chatted, jested, laughed, told anecdotes, and finally, inspired Frank, who gave a laughable description of their adventures on the Alleghanies: of being upset in the slaughter-trough, and pitched into Wolfe's Lick; of being lost in the fog, and near going down the Devil's Staircase; finally, of being caught in the tempest, and shut up in a mountain-hut with a raving maniac. At this the old gentleman began to rally his proud daughter on her gentleness of ill humor of the preceding evening, at the said delay, and then to assail the young man for their effeminacy and want of gallantry, courage, in suffering themselves to be deluged by the storm. Now, to be charged, all at once, with effeminacy, and want of gallantry, and courage, even in jest, was too much, and in Frank's case, too near the truth to go without reply. So he began vehemently to deny the charge, entertaining the assembled company that it was not altogether effeminacy, for that they had been hospitably sheltered in the cabin of a beautiful shepherdess.

"Yes," said Frank, maliciously, "a beautiful that Clifton there couldn't keep his eyes off of her, and while I sat and played checkers with her brother, he sat and studied her face, and it was a book"—for lovers. I wish you had seen him, Miss Clifton—

"Never gazed the moon
Upon the water as he sat and read
As 'twere her eyes.'

Fast, my dear lady, and I should be guilty of misquotation of treasure, to conceal it!" laughed Frank, shaking his head at his friend.

"Ah-h-h! H-a-a-h!—are you there, my fine fellow!" exclaimed the old gentleman, gleefully rubbing his hands, and pointing his finger at his nephew, greatly enjoying his discomfiture.

"I assure you, sir," began Captain Clifton, gravely.

"Oh! don't assure us! don't assure us! Assure Carolyn! What d'ye think o' that, Carolyn? What d'ye think of that? More handi-till-than ever, the back of her neck, and landing an intellectual and queenly grace in the proud head. The costume of that day closely resembled the prevailing mode of our own. Miss Clifton wore a dress of pale blue silk, made low in the neck, with a long-waisted stomacher, tight sleeves reaching to the elbows, and ample flowing skirt. The neck was trimmed with a full of deep lace, then called a "tucker," and answering to the present berthe. The tight half-sleeves were trimmed at the elbows by deep lace ruffles, shading the arm. A necklace of large strung pearls around her throat, a bracelet of the same on her arm, and a pearl-headed pin run through the Grecian knot of ringlets at the back of her head, completed her toilet. She carried in her hand and toyed carelessly with a beautiful fan of marabout feathers. She was the daughter of the first Mrs. Clifton, of Clifton, a fair, proud Maryland lady, one of the haughty Gowens, who thought long enough to enquire by precept and example, the double portion of family arrogance Carolyn Clifton had inherited from both sides of her house. Miss Clifton had "received her education" at a first-class "Ladies' Institute" at Richmond.

Xaleine, the younger sister, was about fourteen years of age, but well grown and full-formed for her years. She was the daughter of the second Mrs. Clifton, a beautiful West Indian Creole, who died in giving her life. She had the snowy skin and damask cheek of her father's fair race, and the glittering black hair and sparkling black eyes of her Creole mother. Her dress was of plain white muslin, with short sleeves and low neck, and coral neck-lace, which well-set off the exceeding brilliancy of her complexion. Xaleine was home for the mid-summer holidays.

Mrs. Clifton, of Clifton, Georgia!

"Yes, she is indeed the most beautiful woman in the whole world," exclaimed Fairfax, to himself, as he turned from the fair and dignified Carolyn—the brilliant and sparkling Xaleine to the dark and graceful Georgia. She is of medium height. Her complexion is a rich, dark, uniform olive, her very cheeks being of the same hue, but so transparent clear, that that which would mar the perfection of another face, adds deeper beauty to hers. Yes! the delicate bloom of the fair Carolyn, and the bright damask blush of the brilliant Xaleine, are common place beside the perfect beauty of the pure, clear olive cheek of the dark Georgia. Her hair is intensely black, with depths under depths of darkness, lurking in the labyrinths of irregular curls that cluster around, and throw so deep a shadow over her witching face. Her eyebrows are black and arched. Her eyelashes are long, black, and drooping. Her eyes are—pause—I have been trying to think of something to which her wondrous eyes may compared, for darkness, profundity and power. Midnight! No, her eyes are darker, stiller, and more solemn yet. Thunder clouds! No, for her eyes are more stormy and impending still—and their electric smoke is silent as it is fatal. In short, her eyes resemble nothing but themselves. Her dress is of black gauze, over black silk, made high to veil her neck, and finished with a narrow black lace, within which gleams around her throat a necklace of jet and gold. She wears no other jewelry. A large black lace mantilla is carelessly thrown over all. When she moves her every movement is waiting grace—her motion might be set to music. And when she sits still she is so still, and dark, and beautiful!—and something else, besides, that the game superlatives something like the fascination and terror one feels in looking down the depths of a dark chasm.

She was the daughter of a portrait painter in Richmond, and this was what Captain Archer Clifton, in his arrogance, called humble parentage. Mr. Clifton had met her under the following circumstances: On finally withdrawing his eldest daughter from school, he wished, before carrying her home, to have her portrait taken, and went for that purpose to the studio of Mr. Feller, portrait and miniature painter, where he chanced to see her for the first time, and that he himself had at length an opportunity of initiating his charming companion into the mysteries of flirtation, while she imparted to him the secrets of chess.

Our Portrait Gallery.

GENERAL SCOTT.

We published in our last a likeness of Gen. Pierce, and this week present a portrait of the Whig candidate for the Presidency, from a late Daguerreotype, which gives, we think, a good idea of "Old Chippewa's" countenance.

The room was now very quiet. And Frank was soon deeply immersed in his game. To the room was very quiet, it seemed the sanctuary of domestic love and happiness! At one extremity of the long apartment, in a deep recess of a bay-window, rather than the bleak of far off seas. At the other extremity sat the graceful young wife, placidly pursuing her quiet work, and chanting more like the darling spoiled child of the old man, her husband, who sat reading by her side, and whose tiled locks often wandered from the paper and rested fondly upon her. About midway the room, sat Frank and his bright companion too deeply interested in their chess to notice the happy lovers, or to observe the quiet contentment of the old man with his beautiful darling. Yes, this room seemed a temple of domestic truth and trust—of family peace and joy. At least so thought Frank, until raising his eyes from his game, his glance chanced to fall for an instant upon the face of Mrs. Clifton.

It might have been the darkness of her surroundings which threw into such strong relief that fearful countenance, for the black dress and flowing black mantilla veiled all her form, while the shadowing deep black curls darkly shaded her face. Her form had turned from the table and bent over the arm of the chair—her bosom was heaving, her lips apart and humid, her nostrils slightly distended, and her eyes, those dreadful eyes, fixed with a passionate, fierce, devouring gaze upon some distant object.

Frank hopelessly followed the direction of that overcoming gaze, to where the betrothed lovers sat fully reconciled. Clifton, unconscious of all eyes, but those blue orbs that smiled so graciously upon him, was pressing Carolyn's hand to his lips in an ecstasy of love and gratitude. Frank turned again to Mrs. Clifton. Her countenance had changed as by the passage of a thunder-cloud. Her face was darkened, her teeth and lips clenched together, her eyes fixed upon the lovers with the baleful glare of a demon. If the head of the fabled Medusa had suddenly met his astonished gaze, he could not have felt a deeper thrill of horror. And yet it was only a look—the look of an instant—it came and went like the swift sweeping past of a fiend's wing—but the shadow on all things seemed to remain. No more did that room seem the blessed retreat of household faith and love—no! a deadly serpent lay coiled among its flowers—a deadly poison lurked in its cup of joy—the shadow of a demon's wing was brooding in the air—the house was cursed!

Frank was of a highly honorable nature, but nervous and impressible—he could no longer confine his attention to the game; he misplayed awkwardly—ridiculously. Xaleine laughed at him—and her silver laughter struck almost unpleasantly upon his ear. He lost the game, and finally, complimenting his young antagonist upon the excellence of her own play—an exceedence which he admitted he had fully brought out—Frank arose from the table and sauntered out into the piazza, exclaiming inwardly—Ugh! I believe in Satan, since I've seen that woman! Ugh! Who-ee! Every time I think of her I shall feel hot and small brimstone!" I said that Frank was of an extremely impressible nature. He stood now upon the piazza at the back of the house, and the majestic crescent of cliffs was before him. The quiet of the night, the freshness of the dew, the coolness of the breeze, the beauty and sublimity of the mountains rising from their girdle of forest, with their peaks bathed in moonlight—the distant glimpse of the river, with the silver, like a silver lake among the hills—the divine peace and holiness of nature fell soothingly, refreshingly upon his excited nerves. And after mentoring up and down the piazza for some twenty minutes, he returned to the parlor in a happier mood. There he found the family grouped around the table on which sat a silver tray of plum-cake, with the old-fashioned, tall silver fruit knives and napkins.

"Come, Mr. Fairfax, my dear fellow, we are waiting for you," said the old gentleman, beckoning him.

Frank joined them at the table, and after this repast was over, the family separated and retired to bed.

CHAPTER III.

MRS. CLIFTON, OF HARDBARGAIN.

She is a lady of confirmed honor, of an unmistakable spirit, and determination in all virtuous resolutions; not merry to encompass a friend, nor slow to bring the enemy to confusion. Charles Lamb.

Clifton by the morning sunlight! Oh! that I could shew it to you as Fairfax saw it from the balcony of his chamber on the morning after his arrival! The whole face of the country was very high, yet even these elevated land were broken into hills and vallies, rocks and glens.—Behind the house arose the white cliffs so often mentioned, shutting out the Northern view, but before the house lay the valley in which the plantation was situated, and around that, East, West and South, stretched a magnificent panorama, ridge beyond ridge of mountains, covered with gigantic forests, clothed with the richest verdure, rolling on until they gradually faded away in the distance, their forms lost among the clouds of the horizon. It seemed a vast, boundless ocean of greenery, of which the vales and mountains were the stupendous waves, charmed to sleep.

It was a magnificent solitude. Not a human dwelling to be seen. The planter's mansion—if there were any in the neighborhood, were low in the valley, and hidden from sight. The mountain servant, as it came leaping down the side of the cliff, running through the wooded lawn, hiding itself in the forest vale, and reappearing as a mountain lake among the distant hills, was a beautiful feature in the landscape. The deep, intense blue of the clear skies, the early splendor of the sun-light, the murmur of the breeze among the waving trees, the joyous songs of birds, gladdened all the scene, and put to flight Frank's blue devils long before Dandy called him to breakfast.

The breakfast-table was not in the hall under the shade of the plaza elms.

The old gentleman, in his suit of cool white linen—the sisters in neat morning dresses of white cambric, and the dark Georgia, in her usual dress of black, were assembled on the piazza. They greeted Mr. Fairfax with lively welcome, telling him that Clifton had not yet made his appearance. But even while they spoke, Captain Clifton joined them, and they sat down to breakfast. Three breakfasts on the lawn!—How many times in after years, in the sultry heat of the city hotel, did Fairfax recall them!

Soon after breakfast, Captain Clifton invited Mr. Fairfax to accompany him in a ride up the ridge to his mother's farm. And after taking leave of the ladies they set out. They left the house by the back way, and took a winding bridle-path up the side of the cliffs. The day was very fine and cool, and their path was shaded by overhanging trees. It was altogether a delightful ride, and as they went up, Clifton, who led the way, turned his head around and inquired—

"Frank! what instigated you to renounce so last night about our sojourn at the mountain-hut?"

"Romance? I didn't renounce, except in saying that the girl was beautiful. I said that for your credit!"

"Oh! I ought to be exceedingly obliged to you!"

"Yes—I think so, too—but what malicious Puck gave you a love-wood, and looked you into sitting and studying that ugly little girl's hard face all the evening?"

"I did not think her ugly at all. She has a noble countenance. A most noble countenance. Once—a deadly poison lurked in its cup of joy—the shadow of a demon's wing was brooding in the air—the house was cursed!"

"Ha, ha! Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha! I saw nothing but a mountainous forehead, and a strong portentille jaw! Nobis! Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha! I said you'd taken the love-powder!"

"You even you cannot find any but a noble simile in speaking of her ugly features!"

"Ah! what will Miss Clifton think of this admiration?"

"Sir, Miss Clifton has my deepest homage, and when she is my wife, she will indulge no follies. But, Fairfax, you are absurd, and I beg you will abandon this ridiculous conversation. You know that I have always had a proclivity to the study of character. Nature made no something of a physiognomist. And if there be any truth in my favorite science, that mountain girl's face presented the most extraordinary combination of power and goodness I have ever met with."

"Oh! then you only studied the maiden as the botanist would study a new plant, the geologist a new fossil, or the naturalist a strange animal?—"

"Or the astronomer a new star? Precisely, sir! Except that the human being is the highest and most absorbing study of all!"

"Really! really! this passes belief—the proud, fastidious Archer Clifton, to be smitten with an ugly mountain girl!"

"Frank! if—assure you really anger me. Listen, then, and I will tell you why that child—for she is but a child—interested me so much. I saw in her face the signs of wonderful force of character, as yet undeveloped, and I saw in all her actions that which corroborated their testimony. I was surprised to find all that in the humble mountaineer, and speculated as to what, in her very humble situation, it might lead.—That was simply all!"

"And did you not wish to be a providence to the mountain girl, and open a field for so much energy?"

"Perhaps such a thought might have presented itself to my mind. If so it was disclaimed at once. A highly gifted man of low birth must have extraordinary talents indeed, and be placed in extraordinary circumstances, to elevate himself above his condition—for a girl in such a case it is impossible. But, Frank, really this conversation has taken a more serious tone than I designed it should. Really, mobility of character, though very much among the lower classes of society, is yet not so impossible as to excite our wonder. There are others like Kate Kavanagh—"

"How pat you've got her name! Now I had forgotten it!"

"Pooh! I say there are others like her. They are born great—they live and die, and the world knows nothing of them. And hence that delightful theory of the equality of mankind, and decided the destinies of an empire, have been employed to divest the household of a shepherd, and determine the fate of a sheep! Such is the order of society, and better, far better so, than that its boundaries should be thrown down, its ranks intermingled!"

"There spoke a Clifton of Clifton!" said Frank.

They were now at the top of the ridge, and entering upon a hard, stony, half-cultivated farm, in the midst of which stood a rude, but substantial house, built of hewn rocks of every shade of gray, and surrounded by trees. Before them, all around, rose the forest-covered hills; behind them the white cliffs concealed the mansion of Clifton from their sight; all around them lay fields of cleared ground, and Mother's society of Clifton, by marrying a fourth wife."

"I am impressed with the idea that your mother is a very proud woman, Clifton!" said Frank, taking advantage of Captain Clifton's first thoughtful pause.

"No, no," he answered, slowly, as in half reverie, "no—she is not what the world calls proud—she is no contemner of rank, as I am. She is the very reverse of that, and so is the whole Republic. Sprung, herself, from an ancient, noble, and haughty race, she yet honors talent and virtue, when met with in the lowest ranks, as much—nay, I verily believe, more, than when found in the highest circles, where it is natural they should be more frequently seen."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Selected Sketch.

A PREDICTION.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN.

Jacques Cazotte, after having passed a part of his life at Martinique, as overseer of the Leeward Islands, returned to France, where he was engaged in a famous law-suit with the Society of Jesuits, who refused to pay a bill of exchange which he had received from Pere Lavalette, to whom he had sold his goods and possessions in Martinique. Having gained his suit, he established himself in the borough of Pleury, near Epernay, where he devoted himself to literature, in the bosom of his family, to which he was fervently attached. His wealth have been completely happy if his business had not called him, from time to time, to Paris. At each visit he returned more and more dejected. The revolutions, of which he had a premonitment, was advancing with gigantic strides. The death of his wife increased his melancholy, and in consequence of this event, he resigned the charge of Huthargais, overlooking the laborers. He has ever since overseer! Frank! you appreciate high worth when you see it! I may, besides, tell you anything—you are my only companion—I tell you that my dear mother was one in ten thousand. She was a true heroine, a heroine of domestic life. Abandoning all her habits of elegance and refinement, despising luxury, ease and comfort, disdaining the smiles of the world, and giving herself to toil and hardship, and vexatious of body and mind, that she might win from the desert an independent home for her family! My dear mother had no reason to suppose, and never admitted the possibility that my uncle would not be blessed with a male heir, that I, her son, for whom she toiled to secure a rugged farm, would be the inheritor of entailed Clifton! And so she toiled, year after year, until at the end of the war, when the army was reduced, and my father came home, he found a comfortable home, and a productive farm."

Clifton seemed to be falling into one of his fits of reminiscence; and conscious that he was talking to his true but volatile friend, uncourteously conscious that he was talking at all, he went on—

"My first recollection of my dearest mother, is of a very noble looking lady, of dark complexion, black hair, and gray eyes. I recollect, when an infant of four years old, looking brought me from the bosom of Clifton every morning, to the back road gate, where she sat upon her horse awaiting us, with a little basket, containing our dinner, hanging on the horn of the saddle. I used to be lifted to the saddle before her, and while her left arm encircled me, with her right hand she would guide her horse around the base of the cliff, and take the wind-ing bridle-path that led up the Rocky Ridge, upon which lay her sterile farm of Hardbargain. Oh! I remember how she used to ride from field to field, making investigations, and giving directions to her rude workmen—and with what deference the rough men were used to address her—but in hand. I remember, too, out cold and frosty days, when under the cliffs of an old tree, whose lowest branches sheltered a fine spring—the head waters of that very torrent, which, in course of time and space, swells into the mighty river I told you of. Oh! my noble mother! how few would have displayed her courage and fortitude!—not one in a million but would have either run down in the latter or rose in abundance of Clifton, where she had a long welcome 'for as long as she should choose to stay—rather than have dared the toil and hardship that she endured. The land was at last cleared up, the farm laid off in order, and I brought under the best possible cultivation. A comfortable house was built, and my mother moved into it to receive my father when he should come home, at the disbanding of his company. So of all the guests, had taken no part in the civil war, Lord Fairfax, of Greenway Courthouse, was the first handsomely dressed to Yorktown. The great, who by his influence seemed to protect us against the general enthusiasm, was Cazotte.

"Yes," cried Cazotte, "we shall all behold this grand and sublime revolution. Nothing can change the decrees of Providence. The spirit has told me that we shall all behold it!" Having uttered these words, he resigned into the gloomy misery into which he had been plunged during the repast.

"We hope, indeed, to be both witnesses and actors in this great drama of deliverance," replied the guests. "Here is a fine prophet!"

"Prophet! yes, I am one!" replied Cazotte, roused by these words from his revery. "The drama of the revolution has just passed before me; I know that which is doing, and that which will be done. And you, who are around me, would you have me tell you in what manner you will be both exiled and witnesses?"

"Let us hear," said Condorcet, with the gloomy smile, which was peculiar to him. "Habeack has the floor."

Cazotte rose, and gazing sadly for some moments at the speaker, he stretched his arm towards him in an attitude of menace, and exclaimed—

"You, M. de Condorcet, overwhelmed with indignation and calumnies, will expire upon the pavement of a dungeon, enraged at having delivered over your country to the tyranny of the populace; you will die from poison, which you will take to escape the scaffold."

The company were silent. The wine, however, was still fermenting in their heads; the countenance came to mean the face, and the guests re-filled their glasses; they now recollected that Cazotte was subject to hallucinations of this kind, and they gave loose to their merriment. "M. Cazotte," said they, "do take that you give us is not as amusing as your Diable amoureux."

"I prefer the Lord impromptu," cried another.

"I prefer the Thousand-and-one fables," added Champfort.

"You, M. Champfort," resumed Cazotte, "you will open your veins with two-and-twenty cuts of the razor, and still you will survive your bleeding wrists by six months."

Rank gazed at the others and endeavored to laugh. They d'Aiguillon began to chaunt forth a De Profundis.

"You do well, M. Vicq d'Azyr; you are chanting your own funeral anthem. You will not open your veins, for you will fear lest your pain should torture you; you will require the service of a friend, to be more sure of the deed, and, bathed in your blood, you will expire in the agony of the gout, at midnight. Sing, look at yonder clock; it is about to strike the hour of your death!"

The hand pointed to a quarter of one, upon the dial-plate. By a movement which they were unable to avoid, all the guests rose one after the other. As they did so, Cazotte, like a shepherd counting his flock, numbered successfully his victims. "You will die upon the scaffold," he said, to Nicolai; "you, Bonvier, M. Bailly; you likewise, M. Malesherbes; you Roucher, M. Roucher. The scaffold or suicide awaits you all!"

Terror began to gain upon the guests. Still, all endeavored to appear unconcerned. They whispered to each other: "You see he is mad! he jests, and he always blends something of the marvellous with his pleasantries. Cazotte is not one of the Illuminati for nothing." Notwithstanding these words of mutual encouragement, the women seemed to deem prophecies with more seriousness. The Duchess of Vitre, in order to encourage her companions, inquired at what time all this would happen.

"Six years will not pass away before all that I have said you will be fulfilled."

"How is a harvest of miracles," (it was La Harpe who now spoke,) "and for you cannot see for nothing among these marvels?"

"You will indeed be counted among them, and as a marvel to the full as extraordinary as the rest. I behold you striking with your hero forehead the marble pavement of the metropolis; you kiss the hand of one of these Princes of whom you mock to-day; you seek after poems of hatred in the gloom of the scaffold, and after repose of conscience in the garden which comes from the eye of a confessor."

This prophecy, true and, although perhaps more surprising than the rest, somewhat restored gaiety to this circle, which Cazotte's vision had just darkened.

"I demand again," cried Champfort, "if we do not die until La Harpe is converted we are immortal?"

"The example given by the Duchess of Vitre was soon followed by Madame de Grammont.

"We are very fortunate, we women," she said, "to be counted for nothing in revolutions. When I say for nothing, I do not mean that we do not generally meddle a little with them, but it is agreed on that we are not to be held to an account for it, and our sex," she added, turning to Cazotte with a circlous tone, "will doubtless—"

But the prophet was pitiless. "Your sex will not protect you."

"What is that you say? Why, it is the end of the world if you are speaking of—"

"It is possible; but that which is certain, is this: you, Madame the Duchess de Grammont, will be conducted to the scaffold, you, and many other dames with you, with your hands bound behind your back."

"I hope that, in that case, I shall at least have a carriage hung with black."

"No, madame; ladies of higher rank than yourself will ride thither in a cart, and with their hands bound like yours."

"Ladies of higher rank! What! princesses of the blood?"

"Ladies of still higher rank!"

Here there was a general movement in the assembly. No one looked upon a move explicit answer. The tapers spread but a dim light through the apartment; fatigue and alarm were visible in the pale features of the guests; the remnants of the repast lay scattered about the table, across which fell, from time to time, the fantastic shadows of the dawn, as it crept through the lofty windows. Cazotte's voice broke the silence. He arised in a gloomy, hollow tone: "I have gone seven times about the ramparts, and I have cried: Woe to Jerusalem! woe to Jerusalem! woe to myself!"

The Duchess of Vitre dared not put another question to Cazotte. Madame de Grammont, in order not to appear alarmed, said, with an evident effort:

"You will see! he will not have me even a confessor."

"No, madame," continued the inexorable seer, "you will have none, neither you nor the others. The last victim who will enjoy this privilege will be——"

He paused for a moment.

"Well, who is the happy mortal who will enjoy this prerogative?"

"It is the last of his prerogatives which will remain to the King of France."

After this prediction, silence became so famous, for, the chance which had dictated, seemed to take pleasure in fulfilling it, in all its details. Cazotte saluted the company and departed, leaving his emotions such in profound stupor.*

* Cazotte's sagacity was very remarkable; his connection with the Illuminati may have added a degree of acuteness to his faculty, and it is not impossible but that this association, connected with a perfect knowledge of the men and affairs of his age, may have given, at times, a singular correctness to his predictions. Prophets are not necessarily sorcerers; a little good sense is, often, all that is requisite. La Harpe, who was one of the actors in the singular drama which we have commented, rejoice to it in his memoirs.

Selected

Miscellaneous.

THE CHILD OF THE IMPERIAL GUARD!

BY E. BENTLEY BEALE.

About the year 1820, I was at the house of one of our most celebrated French chemists. It was a dinner party, and the conversation of the days—for everything connected with the great personage had come to rest on him. We were seated around the fire, and were surrounding with perfect freedom, when the general announced M. Louis Jacquet, and we saw enter a young officer of cavalry, of a most distinguished appearance. The chemist's wife was connected on one hand with the family of his late master, and on the other within the limited rank his wife occupied. We imbibed on it, the General commanded, the young officer resigned himself to be placed in a corner, and we listened to the following recital:

At the first interview between Napoleon and Alexander, the first of these two Emperors wished to show the other the troops who had come to the general him, ordered a general review. Napoleon surveyed with complacency the reality of his Imperial Guard, when he suddenly stopped before a grenadier who had on his face a most white, beginning on his forehead, descended to the middle of his cheek. He regarded him a moment with pride, and joining him out with his finger to the Emperor Alexander—

"What think you," said he to him, "of all the soldier who can resist such wounds as that?"

"What think you of the soldiers who inflict all them?" answered Alexander, with a happy person of mind.

"They are nuts!" said the old grenadier, in a solemn voice, laughing, by this sublime sentiment, in the conversation of the two most powerful monarchs of the world. Alexander, whose question had embarrassed Napoleon, turned towards him and said, with courtesy:

"Sire, you are everywhere victor."

"It is the guard who have made me so," an pursued Napoleon, making a gesture of thanks to his grenadier.

A few days after this review, Napoleon was walking in the garden of his guard, thinking perhaps of the conquest of Spain, or maybe of the old grenadier who had entrusted him from his perplexity, when he perceived him sitting on a stone, his legs crossed, his arms on his knees, a little—any of a boy, apparently about a year old, at the most. The Emperor stopped before him; but the old soldier did not rise, and only said:

"Pardon, sire; but if I rise, Jacquet will cry out like a Prussian fife, and perhaps that would disturb your Majesty."

"That is right," said Napoleon; "your name is Jacques?"

"Yes, my Emperor, Jacques. That is why they call this little fellow Jacquet."

"Is he your son?"

"Humph! my Emperor, his mother was a brave canteen-bearer, to whom about two months ago, a rascal of a Cossack gave a blow on the head of her neck, while she was pouring out a drop of brandy for her husband, a poor cuirassier, who had just had his leg carried away. The caused her death, and the child is an orphan."

"And you have adopted the infant?" said the Emperor.

"I and the others. We found him at the bivouac of his mother, who no longer stirred, chafing like a horseman on foot, and his stomach as empty as the coffers of the King of Spain.—The rascal, who still breathed a little, told to how its mother had been killed in the service of your Majesty. So we have adopted the youngster, and as I was the one who found him first, I have the charge of bringing him up."

Napoleon gazed in silence on a moment on the old grenadier, who continued to give Jacquet a lesson in balancing on his foot, and then said to him—

"Jacques, I owe you something."

"Me, my Emperor! You have given me the aram for this year; it is I who owe you a return."

"It is it," rejoined Napoleon, "for what you said to the Emperor Alexander."

"I have said nothing merit to that Emperor! He has complained of me, perhaps?"

"By no means," said Napoleon; "for I wish to reward you. Let us see, what do you want?"

"Ma foi," answered Jacques, "I do not wish anything; but since you wish to do me a favor, give something to this little fellow that will please him."

"Very willingly," said the Emperor. Jacques arose, placed the infant on his arm, and approached, while Napoleon searched his pockets for something to give the child. He found nothing there but some pieces of gold, which he quickly replaced, for it was not with money that Napoleon gained the hearts of his soldiers. He searched again, without finding anything but some notes. He was about to give one of these to the lad with him, when he discovered his tobacco-box in a corner of his waistcoat pocket, and offered it to the grenadier. Jacques burst into a laugh on seeing the box, and said—

"What foolishness! to give a tobacco-box to a child who has never even smoked!"

The Emperor was going to reply, when he felt something pulling at his hat, and saw that the infant, who was on the arm of the grenadier, had slipped his hand into the loop and was playing with the cockade.

"Hold, fine," said the grenadier; "the little one is larger than both of us. He eats like your Majesty—he takes what suits him."

"Very well," said the Emperor; "let him keep it." And having himself pulled the cockade from his chapeau, he restored it to the child, to whom Jacques said, tossing him in his arms—"Come, show his Majesty that you know how to talk." The child, laughing and clapping its hands, babbled forth, in a broken manner, the words—Vive l'Empereur.

After that day, Jacques made many journeys. He returned to Paris, went to Madrid, afterwards to Vienna, pushed on to Moscow, and accompanied Napoleon to the island of Elba. Jacquet was in all his campaigns, sometimes on horseback, his little steps with the gigantic strides of the grenadiers of the guard, sometimes riding with the baggage, and then again astride on the knapsack of some grumbler, who relieved the ennui on his face at the sight of his merry infant. He had a little sabre, and a cuirassier's cap, which he had already learned to wear over one ear, and he played on the fife like a consummate musician, when bored and harassed Napoleon, on state leave in his mother and his nursery, had brought Jacquet to love and honor like the rest. The grenadier, however, had been much perplexed as to the manner in which to discuss under the cold wear the cockade; but the time struck him to endure it in a bucket, which he suspended from his neck, saying to him—

"Listen, Jacquet, you can wear your cockade morning and evening, on this side, as I shall make you out your hands and without taking it."

This arrangement was chosen, and the little cockade, pending the bucket, was worn by Jacques and Jacquet, and his poor Jacquet. Louis, who accompanied, and never abandoned him, and his little cockade, but often held me that when each, his man was, to see, his brave father, who had made, some months before, formed the rear of Moreau or Pichegru, or Jourdan, or Hoche, fell down almost dying with fatigue at the end of a few leagues of the route, was that he wanted nothing but a small bundle of clothes, and a paltry chair. He gave many heads every day; then he passed the night in miserable stables, where Jacques picked up the straw of which the Emperor's bed was made for the old grenadier. He watched beside him at night, and shared with him the morsels of bread which he obtained from the charity of the inn-keepers. But at last the weakness of Jacques became so great that they were forced to stop at a desolate hut, where the unhappy old soldier, overcome by suffering, had these words addressed to him as he lay on a bit of straw: "Courage, my old friend, courage; we are not far from Paris, and I do." The grenadier tried to reply, but began to say with all his might, that he was not afraid himself by the cockade and attempted to ask some; but he obtained nothing, and was overwhelmed with despair, when on the next day, Jacques, on him such an despair inspired, ordered his breakfast on his knees, drew his bucket from his breast, and exhibited to his eyes the cockade of the Emperor! And he continued this touching appeal, almost suffocated with grief. Ah this moment, a gentleman approached Jacques, his interest, a gentleman approached Jacques, his interest, a gentleman approached Jacques, in his interest, a gentleman approached Jacques, by saying, "Father Jacques has forbidden me ever to part with this cockade; he has told me that it would protect me, that it was my fortune; and I would sell it my last sou rather than lose it; however, you will give me a single sou for it, take it; I shall buy some brandy for father Jacques."

The poor old man sobbed, answered the boy: "Be to whom you prayed, has left in France a few old soldiers who will shave his beards with their old scimitars. Lead me to Jacques. And this sum—"

"This broadsheet man," cried the young officer, interrupting the story of the General's lady, "this broadsheet man took me in his arms, we, a poor child, and I, a man of sixty years, and carried me to his cradle; he restored me to life; he procured to him a subsistence, and he has educated me, an orphan, as his own son, and he loads the every day with benefits!" And the young marine burst into tears as he finished these words. The General and his wife held out their hands to him, while the former rolled out to him in turn:

"You have not finished the story, Louis; you forgot to state that I promised to restore your cockade to you, and that you called me—"

"Ah, my General," rejoined the young officer, with an agreeable gained, as we have gained one: and, as you see, the cockade is in his hat; for Louis was at the taking of Algiers, and his captain, who took him as an orphan for them, has sent him back as ensign."

At these words, the brave General almost fell to the ground. It was all useful to learn: and the old officer mentioned, wiping his eyes and his mustaches, "I said truly you would plunge them all in tears."—Boston Journal.

MEDIÆVAL KNOCKINGS.

A correspondent of the National Intelligencer quotes a story from the Chevalier of Sir John Froissart, by which we learn that the Fox and Fish commandeer is of quite an ancient origin. From this account, it appears that, about the year 1390, one Sir Espaign de Lyon—or Lord Espaign of Coucy—had a difficulty with a priest or "clerk," about tithes, the collection of which he had resisted. The priest threatened vengeance, and departed—"About three months after, when the knight least thought of it, and was sleeping in his bed with his lady, in his castle of Coucy, there came to the castle gate a varlet, who knocked so long, knocking about everything they met with in the castle, as if they were determined to destroy all within it; and they gave such loud raps at the door of the chamber of the knight, that the lady was exceedingly frightened.

"The knight heard it well, but did not say a word, as he would not hear it a second time. He was alarmed, for he was a man of sufficient courage for any adventure. These noises and taunts continued in different parts of the castle for a considerable time, and then ceased. On the morrow, all the servants of the household assembled, and went to their lord and said:

"'My lord, we have heard what we all heard this night?' My Lord de Coucy, dissembled, and replied: 'What is it you have heard?' They then related to him all the noises and rioting they had heard, and that the plates in the kitchen had been broken. He began to laugh, and said: 'It was nothing; that they had dreamed it, or that it had been the wind.' 'In the name of God,' added the lady, 'I will heard it.'"

On the following night, the noises and rioting were renewed, but much louder than before; and then some such blows struck against the door and windows of the chamber of the knight that it seemed they would break them down. The knight could not sleep, and was leaping out of his bed, and calling out,—Who is it that at this hour thus knocks at my chamber door?' He was instantly answered,—'It is I.'" "And who sends thee hither?" asked the knight. "The Clerk of Catalonia, whom thou hast much wronged, for thou hast deprived him of the rights of his benefice; I tell thee, therefore, leave thou quiet until then hast rendered him a just account, with which he shall be contented." "What art then called," said the knight, "who art so good a messenger?" "My name is Orthon." "Orthon," said the knight, "if serving a clerk will not be of much advantage to thee, I will be thy master, and will give thee great trouble; I hang thee well, therefore, leave him and serve me, and I shall think myself obliged to thee." Orthon was ready with his answer, for he had taken a liking to the knight, and said: "Do you wish it?" "Yes," replied the knight, "but no harm must be done to any one within these walls." "Oh, no," answered Orthon, "I have no power to do ill to any one, only to awaken thee, and disturb thy rest, or that of other persons." "Do what I tell thee," added the knight, "we shall agree; and leave this wicked priest, for he is a worthless fellow, and unworthy of thy service." "Well," replied Orthon, "since thou will have it so, I consent."

Orthon took such an affection to the Lord de Coucy that he came often to see him in the night time; and when he found him sleeping he pulled his pillow under his head, or made several noises at the door or windows; so that when the knight was awakened, he said: "Orthon, let me sleep." "I will not," replied he, "until I have told thee some news." The knight's lady was so much frightened the hairs on her head stood on end, and she hid herself under the bed clothes. "Well," said the knight, "and what news hast thou to tell me?" Orthon replied, "I am come from England, Hungary, or some other place, which I left yesterday, and such and such things have happened." Thus did the Lord de Coucey know by the means of Orthon all things that were passing in different parts of the world; and this connexion continued for five years.

* * * *

The knight subsequently became desirous of seeing his "invisible messenger," when the following dialogue took place:—The knight interrogates the spirit, "And whence doest thou come from?" "I come from Prague, in Bohemia." "How far is it hence?" "Sixty days' journey." "How canst thou then at least thou returned thence in so short a time?" "Yes, as my God help me;" I travel as fast as the wind, or faster." "What, hast thou got wings?" "Oh, no." "How then canst thou fly so fast?" "That is no business of yours." "No!" said the knight, "I should like exceedingly to see what form thou hast, and how thou art made." "That does not concern you in the least," replied Orthon; "be satisfied that you hear me, and that I bring you intelligence you may depend on."

That the spirit of Orthon did afterwards appear to the knight, first in the form of "two straws which were turning and playing together on the floor," and afterwards as "an immense, by large cow," the curious reader will learn by reference to Froissart's Chronicles, (John's translation, Vol. III., Chapter 16.)

☞ A BREAKFAST CONTINUED.—A notice of a recent amusement explosive closes as follows:—"The captain swam ashore. So did the steamboat. She was insured for $15,000, and loaded with rum."

SATURDAY EVENING POST.

HENRY PETERSON, EDITOR.

PHILADELPHIA:

SATURDAY, JULY 31, 1858.

ALL THE CONTENTS OF THIS POST ARE SET UP EXPRESSLY FOR IT, AND IT ALONE. IT IS NOT A MERE REPRINT OF A DAILY PAPER.

TERMS, &c.

The terms of the POST are $2, if paid in advance—$3, if not paid in advance. For $5 in advance, one copy is sent three years. We send three to the following low terms to Clubs, to be sent, in the city, to one address, and in the country to one Post Office:

4 Copies, - - - $5 (or Advance.
8 " (and one to Agent, or the getter up of the Club,) $10 "
15 " (and one to Agent, or the getter up of the Club,) $20 "
25 " (and one to Agent, or the getter up of the Club,) $30 "

Address to Clubs—Any person having the money and means for a Club, may add new names to it at the same rate, provided the latter will allow their subscriptions to end at the same time those of the club list do. We will willingly supply the back numbers if the subscriber to Club, and at one and the same time, and thus prevent confusion.

The Money for Clubs must always be sent in advance. When the case is large, a draft should be procured, if possible—the cost of which may be deducted from the amount.

Post Masters or others acting for Clubs, can remit at our risk by sending them in bank notes, or when they can do so conveniently.

All persons ordering letters to us should be careful to give the name of the State, as well as of the town, to which they live. All letters must be paid.

Persons ordering their papers changed, will please give the name of the Post Office to be changed from, as well as the Post Office they wish it transmit sent to.

We trust our old friends the Postmasters, will exert themselves and get up large Clubs for the Mammoth Post; or if they do not feel inclined to take advantage of our liberal offer themselves, that they will show our Prospectus to some other influential and active person who will be willing to do so. It must be remembered that the postage is just the same on a first-class paper, as on the meanest and poorest of the small reprints.

A MARVELLOUS STORY.

The N. Y. Statesman contains a very singular affidavit, which we copy. The story that precedes it, relates that about forty-five years ago, a man named Hodgdon worked in London, N. H., as a joiner. During the last season he lived there, he finished off a house for a Mr. Jonathan Noyes, to whom likewise he lent two or three hundred dollars in money, as that Noyes son, altogether, indebted to him about two hundred dollars for labor and cash. The Hodgdon's property was destroyed, and the old people, some little excitement existed at the time in consequence; but as he was a stranger, in a manner, it was thought he had absconded in debt, especially, as, soon after, Noyes gave out that he had received a letter from the man, requesting him to sell certain tools he had left behind. Hogs died a few years after, and on his death-bed intimated that he had a disclosure to make before he could die in peace, but, it appears, a neighbor named Mann was with him a whole day before his death. Yet nothing more was said about divulgement, though Noyes regained in good agony, crying, "O God forgive me that one sin!"

The late executor of Mann, however, at about death the incidents seem to in the affidavit are said to have taken place, has determined the mystery. Mr. Ira Goodall, the justice before whom the deposition was made, prefaces it with his testimony as to the character of the witness, and states that he has no doubt they are one of the most conscientious of their hearts." The following is the affidavit:—

We, the undersigned, depose and say, that on Sunday evening, June 13, A. D., 1813, we were called to watch with Mr. Samuel Mann our neighbor of North Londonderry. One of us had been with him the Friday night before, to watch, and had stopped there at the family's request. Saturday night and Sunday through the day. Mr. Whitaker came to watch about 7 o'clock in the evening, and the family soon after retired to rest, and left us in the sick room. At 12 o'clock, the hall door on the north side, the fire-place on the north side, the doorway to the kitchen on the east, and a door leading to the bed-room on the west end of the room, and a window on the south side of the room near the foot of the bed, and a window by the foot, on the north side. The window on the south side was filled with wood, and the door into the kitchen was open, and Mr. George W. Mann slept there. The door into the bed-room was shut, and Mrs. Peter Howe and Mrs. Mann slept there. It was a very pleasant night. Friday night; its extremities were cold, and yet the longest on; he seemed much stronger, and was able to converse with us. He was mentally still alive, and apparently insensible. When all was still Sunday night, and Mr. Whitaker was standing by the foot of the bed, close to the door, and by the east side of the room, Mr. Morris was sitting south of the bed, some four or five paces from the head of the bed on the west side of the room, and we were sitting, chatting, and standing on the easiest over the fire place, when we both distinctly heard a groan—a kind of a long, deep-drawn breath, out of, and near him and the drawers, and to Mr. Morris it seemed north-east and near the drawers. We are both positive it could not come from any other point, and the bed where he was, nor from another room. It was a deep, weighted groan, and startled us both. Mr. Whitaker stepped from the foot of the bed, where he was standing by the open window to see what the noise was, and what caused it. As he took the light and turned round toward the bed, he saw Mr. Mann sitting bolt upright at once with an unearthly grimness colored light. It almost extinguished the light of the candle, as it flashed in his face; it lit up everything almost out—and immediately we saw a strange looking man between us and the bed, looking apparently at Mr. Mann—his dress we cannot describe, the whole face we did not see. His clothes were dark, but we cannot give the fashion or make, nor say whether he had on boots or not; but we saw his face and his body translated—both stood there side by side, as Morris had risen up. Whitaker still holding the candle in his hand, and no fire in the fire-place. He looked some time, gave any light, and as the strange man stood before us, his back towards us, and his face towards Mr. Mann, he appeared much excited and agitated, he rolled on the bed and threw his arms about and opened his eyes wide open, and appeared frightened at the sight upon the apparition; then he tried to cover up his head, then he spoke and his words were according to our best recollection as follows:

"I am a lost man, and going to hell, and can see hell! and the devil is waiting for me. Oh! I have helped make way with a man—a first-born son, whose little excitement existed at the time in consequence; but as he was a stranger, in a manner, it was thought he had absconded in debt, especially, as, soon after, Noyes gave out that he had received a letter from the man, requesting him to sell certain tools he had left behind. Hogs died a few years after, and on his death-bed intimated that he had a disclosure to make before he could die in peace, but, it appears, a neighbor named Mann was with him a whole day before his death. Yet nothing more was said about divulgement, though Noyes regained in good agony, crying, "O God forgive me that one sin!"

The late executor of Mann, however, at about death the incidents seem to in the affidavit are said to have taken place, has determined the mystery. Mr. Ira Goodall, the justice before whom the deposition was made, prefaces it with his testimony as to the character of the witness, and states that he has no doubt they are one of the most conscientious of their hearts." The following is the affidavit:—

We, the undersigned, depose and say, that on Sunday evening, June 13, A. D., 1813, we were called to watch with Mr. Samuel Mann our neighbor of North Londonderry. One of us had been with him the Friday night before, to watch, and had stopped there at the family's request. Saturday night and Sunday through the day. Mr. Whitaker came to watch about 7 o'clock in the evening, and the family soon after retired to rest, and left us in the sick room. At 12 o'clock, the hall door on the north side, the fire-place on the north side, the doorway to the kitchen on the east, and a door leading to the bed-room on the west end of the room, and a window on the south side of the room near the foot of the bed, and a window by the foot, on the north side. The window on the south side was filled with wood, and the door into the kitchen was open, and Mr. George W. Mann slept there. The door into the bed-room was shut, and Mrs. Peter Howe and Mrs. Mann slept there. It was a very pleasant night. Friday night; its extremities were cold, and yet the longest on; he seemed much stronger, and was able to converse with us. He was mentally still alive, and apparently insensible. When all was still Sunday night, and Mr. Whitaker was standing by the foot of the bed, close to the door, and by the east side of the room, Mr. Morris was sitting south of the bed, some four or five paces from the head of the bed on the west side of the room, and we were sitting, chatting, and standing on the easiest over the fire place, when we both distinctly heard a groan—a kind of a long, deep-drawn breath, out of, and near him and the drawers, and to Mr. Morris it seemed north-east and near the drawers. We are both positive it could not come from any other point, and the bed where he was, nor from another room. It was a deep, weighted groan, and startled us both. Mr. Whitaker stepped from the foot of the bed, where he was standing by the open window to see what the noise was, and what caused it. As he took the light and turned round toward the bed, he saw Mr. Mann sitting bolt upright at once with an unearthly grimness colored light. It almost extinguished the light of the candle, as it flashed in his face; it lit up everything almost out—and immediately we saw a strange looking man between us and the bed, looking apparently at Mr. Mann—his dress we cannot describe, the whole face we did not see. His clothes were dark, but we cannot give the fashion or make, nor say whether he had on boots or not; but we saw his face and his body translated—both stood there side by side, as Morris had risen up. Whitaker still holding the candle in his hand, and no fire in the fire-place. He looked some time, gave any light, and as the strange man stood before us, his back towards us, and his face towards Mr. Mann, he appeared much excited and agitated, he rolled on the bed and threw his arms about and opened his eyes wide open, and appeared frightened at the sight upon the apparition; then he tried to cover up his head, then he spoke and his words were according to our best recollection as follows:

"I am a lost man, and going to hell, and can see hell! and the devil is waiting for me. Oh! I have helped make way with a man—a first-born son, whose little excitement existed at the time in consequence; but as he was a stranger, in a manner, it was thought he had absconded in debt, especially, as, soon after, Noyes gave out that he had received a letter from the man, requesting him to sell certain tools he had left behind. Hogs died a few years after, and on his death-bed intimated that he had a disclosure to make before he could die in peace, but, it appears, a neighbor named Mann was with him a whole day before his death. Yet nothing more was said about divulgement, though Noyes regained in good agony, crying, "O God forgive me that one sin!"

The

SATURDAY EVENING POST.

PHILADELPHIA:
SATURDAY, JULY 31, 1852.

SATURDAY EVENING POST
SUGAR-POWER DOSE AND NO FURTHER OUTDO.

No. 66 South Third Street, Philada.,

Where Books, Pamphlets, Hand Bills, Way Bills, Circulars, Job Books, Cards, Labels, &c., &c., are printed with fidelity, in the neatest manner, and on the most reasonable terms.

DEACON & PETERSON, Proprietors.

OUR NOVELETS.

We announce, this week, a new novelet by Mrs. Southworth, entitled—

THE CURSE OF CLIFTON,
A TALE OF EXPIATION AND REDEMPTION.
BY MRS. SOUTHWORTH, author of "The Deserted Wife," "Discarded Daughter," "The Planter's Daughter," &c.

At the conclusion of "The Curse of Clifton," we shall give the Sequel to Vivia—

CLARA MORELAND,
BY EMERSON BENNETT,
author of "Prairie Flower," "Rosalie of the Osage," &c.

In addition to the above works of fiction, we shall not neglect the usual complement of Miscellaneous matter contained in a great degree of the eminent literature that appears in the Weekly Periodicals, together with the Cream of New Works, Original Letters, General News, Gems and other Ephemera, &c., &c., rendering it an unexceptionable expense to add to the variety and interest of our columns, and make them worthy of a first class paper, and of our great circulation.

From Washington.

CONGRESSIONAL NEWS.

SENATE.

On the 19th, the Senate met at 12, M., when petitions were presented; one in favor of the Land Title Law, signed by Cooper, Bryant, Irving, and other citizens of New York.

Mr. Davis reported a bill, authorizing the Secretary of War to purchase a lot of ground in the city of Washington for the use of Rev. Roger Jones, which was read twice, and, after a short debate, ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. Hunter introduced a resolution, directing the Secretary of State to communicate to the Senate, at his earliest convenience, all diplomatic correspondence between the Government of the United States and that of Mexico, relative to our commercial relations with foreign countries.

Mr. Soulé gave notice of a bill relative to appropriations for the payment of claims allowed by Texas and the United States.

Mr. Mason submitted a resolution, to the effect that the President be requested to communicate to the Senate the correspondence between the Government of the United States and that of Mexico, in regard to a right of way across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, granted by Mexico to a Mexican citizen, and which grant, by transfer, has become the property of citizens of the United States; protesting against the information in the possession of the Government concerning the alleged obligation of such grant by Mexico, and the consideration of such grant by the United States, and the stipulations of those engagements, if any, which have been entered into in connection with the same.

Also, all correspondence between the Government of the United States and that of Mexico, in relation to any proposed treaty on the subject. Mr. Mason explained the object of his resolution, including the Gurney grant and the expulsion of the American surveyors.

Mr. Dodge's resolution, relative to the Secretary of the Navy's communication to the Senate in relation to the expenditures of the Navy Department, during the years of War, in 1847, written by Lieutenant Temple, was taken up, and, after a few remarks by Mr. Dodge, was adopted. The bill and the Indemnity Bill was taken up. The Indemnity Bill was read the second time, when the Senate adjourned over to Monday next.

Mr. Stuart explained the provisions of the bill, when, on motion of Mr. Cobb, of Ohio, it was laid on the table—yeas 39, nays 17.

Pending a motion to reconsider the vote, the morning hour expired, and the House went into Committee of the Whole on the River and Harbor Bill.

This was discussed for some time, during which Mr. Cushing offered an amendment, appropriating $50,000 for the improvement of the Passes and Appendages to Rivers, in Virginia, and, after explanations, it was rejected by a vote of 62 yeas to 63 nays.

Pending an amendment the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

On the 20th, the Speaker announced the pending question to be the motion to reconsider the vote, by which was rejected, yesterday, the bill granting right of way and lands to Michigan, to aid in the construction of the Chatham and Ottawa Railroad.

Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, moved that the motion to reconsider be tabled; decided negatively, by a vote of 53 yeas, and 81 nays.

The subject was then postponed until Wednesday next.

On motion of Mr. Stuart the House took up the bill to enable the Executive to furnish citizens on the frontiers with arms, to protect themselves against the Indians.

The Senate returned this bill with certain amendments, one of them proposing to include Utah in the appropriation. Mr. Stuart, pending a motion to concur with the Committee of the House, which prevailed, and the House adjourned.

On the 21st, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of the bill granting right of way to all rail, plank and Macadamized roads, through the lands of the United States, and to States.

On motion of Mr. Rantoul, it was

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, so far as in his opinion it may be compatible with the public interest, all the information in his possession relative to the right of fishing vessels of the United States to take fish within three miles of the United coast of North America, secured to the fishermen provided under the Convention of 1818; and as to any order or regulation issued by any officer or officers of the British Government, or by the said Provinces, for the purpose of interrupting the said fisheries; also, what remonstrances, if any, have been taken by the United States, authorities to protect the rights of the fishermen.

The House refused to lay on the table a bill, granting lands to Illinois and Indiana, for railroad purposes—Yeas 61, nays 78.

Mr. Dury introduced an amendment, giving lands to all the new States for like objects, pending which the morning hour expired.

The consideration of the bill to repeal the contract system and provide for the election of a public printer by Congress, was postponed until Thursday next.

Mr. Stanton, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Printing, reported a joint resolution, providing for the enlargement of the powers of Thomas Ritchie, as agent of Wilson M. Bell, for printing for the Thirty-first Congress. It gives Mr. Ritchie one-half of the price of 1819, in lieu of his contract price.

Mr. Evans, in reply to a question by Mr. Stanly, said it would take out the treasury, 900,000.

After some proceedings the discussion of this resolution was continued for three weeks.

On motion of Mr. McLanahan, the House took up and passed the Senate bill, appropriating to an act passed the Senate bill, appropriating to an act passed at the last session for the relief of Charles Lanman, and to fix the number of members of the House of Representatives, and providing for their due apportionment among the several States, approved May 23d, 1850.

A resolution was adopted, terminating the debate on the River and Harbor Bill to-morrow, at 1 o'clock.

The House then went into Committee on this bill, and, after some remarks in favor by Mr. Marshall, of Ky., the Committee at 3 o'clock took a recess till 4.

Evening Session.—The Committee re-assembled at 4 o'clock, and remained in session, discussing the River and Harbor Bill till nine, when, it was, and the House adjourned.

On the 23d, the House met at 11 o'clock, and proceeded to the consideration of the Hill granting right of way, and two hundred thousand acres of public lands, to Michigan to aid in the construction of a railroad from Detroit to the navigable waters of Lake Michigan, in Ottawa County.

Mr. Stuart explained the provisions of the bill, when, on motion of Mr. Cobb, of Ohio, it was laid on the table—yeas 79, nays 67.

Pending a motion to reconsider the vote, the morning hour expired, and the House went into Committee of the Whole on the River and Harbor Bill.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 26th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the bill be laid on the table—decided negatively, yeas 69, nays 78.

The subject was discussed until the expiration of the morning hour, when the House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy at West Point.

Mr. Hunter said that he intended to offer a substitute, that the Secretary of War and Secretary of the Navy, if not inconsistent with the public service, should report the number of the officers of the Army and Navy employed in and about Washington, and the duties performed by them, and the amount of pay received by them.

Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, moved that the motion to reconsider be tabled; decided negatively, by a vote of 53 yeas, and 81 nays.

The subject was then postponed until Wednesday next.

On motion of Mr. Stanly, the House took up the bill to enable the Executive to furnish citizens on the frontiers with arms, to protect themselves against the Indians.

The Senate returned this bill with certain amendments, one of them proposing to include Utah in the appropriation. Mr. Stuart, pending a motion to concur with the Committee of the House, which prevailed, and the House adjourned.

On the 27th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of the bill granting right of way to all rail, plank and Macadamized roads, through the lands of the United States, and to States.

On motion of Mr. Rantoul, it was

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, so far as in his opinion it may be compatible with the public interest, all the information in his possession relative to the right of fishing vessels of the United States to take fish within three miles of the United coast of North America, secured to the fishermen provided under the Convention of 1818; and as to any order or regulation issued by any officer or officers of the British Government, or by the said Provinces, for the purpose of interrupting the said fisheries; also, what remonstrances, if any, have been taken by the United States, authorities to protect the rights of the fishermen.

The House refused to lay on the table a bill, granting lands to Illinois and Indiana, for railroad purposes—Yeas 61, nays 78.

Mr. Dury introduced an amendment, giving lands to all the new States for like objects, pending which the morning hour expired.

The consideration of the bill to repeal the contract system and provide for the election of a public printer by Congress, was postponed until Thursday next.

Mr. Stanton, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Printing, reported a joint resolution, providing for the enlargement of the powers of Thomas Ritchie, as agent of Wilson M. Bell, for printing for the Thirty-first Congress. It gives Mr. Ritchie one-half of the price of 1819, in lieu of his contract price.

Mr. Evans, in reply to a question by Mr. Stanly, said it would take out the treasury, 900,000.

After some proceedings the discussion of this resolution was continued for three weeks.

On motion of Mr. McLanahan, the House took up and passed the Senate bill, appropriating to an act passed the Senate bill, appropriating to an act passed at the last session for the relief of Charles Lanman, and to fix the number of members of the House of Representatives, and providing for their due apportionment among the several States, approved May 23d, 1850.

A resolution was adopted, terminating the debate on the River and Harbor Bill to-morrow, at 1 o'clock.

The House then went into Committee on this bill, and, after some remarks in favor by Mr. Marshall, of Ky., the Committee at 3 o'clock took a recess till 4.

Evening Session.—The Committee re-assembled at 4 o'clock, and remained in session, discussing the River and Harbor Bill till nine, when it was, and the House adjourned.

On the 28th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and proceeded to the consideration of the Hill granting right of way, and two hundred thousand acres of public lands, to Michigan to aid in the construction of a railroad from Detroit to the navigable waters of Lake Michigan, in Ottawa County.

Mr. Stuart explained the provisions of the bill, when, on motion of Mr. Cobb, of Ohio, it was laid on the table—yeas 79, nays 67.

Pending a motion to reconsider the vote, the morning hour expired, and the House went into Committee of the Whole on the River and Harbor Bill.

This was discussed for some time, during which Mr. Cushing offered an amendment, appropriating $50,000 for the improvement of the Passes and Appendages to Rivers, in Virginia, and, after explanations, it was rejected by a vote of 62 yeas to 63 nays.

Pending an amendment the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

On the 30th, the Speaker announced the pending question to be the motion to reconsider the vote, by which was rejected, yesterday, the bill granting right of way and lands to Michigan, to aid in the construction of the Chatham and Ottawa Railroad.

Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, moved that the motion to reconsider be tabled; decided negatively, by a vote of 53 yeas, and 81 nays.

The subject was then postponed until Wednesday next.

On motion of Mr. Stuart the House took up the bill to enable the Executive to furnish citizens on the frontiers with arms, to protect themselves against the Indians.

The Senate returned this bill with certain amendments, one of them proposing to include Utah in the appropriation. Mr. Stuart, pending a motion to concur with the Committee of the House, which prevailed, and the House adjourned.

On the 31st, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of the bill granting right of way to all rail, plank and Macadamized roads, through the lands of the United States, and to States.

On motion of Mr. Rantoul, it was

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, so far as in his opinion it may be compatible with the public interest, all the information in his possession relative to the right of fishing vessels of the United States to take fish within three miles of the United coast of North America, secured to the fishermen provided under the Convention of 1818; and as to any order or regulation issued by any officer or officers of the British Government, or by the said Provinces, for the purpose of interrupting the said fisheries; also, what remonstrances, if any, have been taken by the United States, authorities to protect the rights of the fishermen.

The House refused to lay on the table a bill, granting lands to Illinois and Indiana, for railroad purposes—Yeas 61, nays 78.

Mr. Dury introduced an amendment, giving lands to all the new States for like objects, pending which the morning hour expired.

The consideration of the bill to repeal the contract system and provide for the election of a public printer by Congress, was postponed until Thursday next.

Mr. Stanton, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Printing, reported a joint resolution, providing for the enlargement of the powers of Thomas Ritchie, as agent of Wilson M. Bell, for printing for the Thirty-first Congress. It gives Mr. Ritchie one-half of the price of 1819, in lieu of his contract price.

Mr. Evans, in reply to a question by Mr. Stanly, said it would take out the treasury, 900,000.

After some proceedings the discussion of this resolution was continued for three weeks.

On motion of Mr. McLanahan, the House took up and passed the Senate bill, appropriating to an act passed the Senate bill, appropriating to an act passed at the last session for the relief of Charles Lanman, and to fix the number of members of the House of Representatives, and providing for their due apportionment among the several States, approved May 23d, 1850.

A resolution was adopted, terminating the debate on the River and Harbor Bill to-morrow, at 1 o'clock.

The House then went into Committee on this bill, and, after some remarks in favor by Mr. Marshall, of Ky., the Committee at 3 o'clock took a recess till 4.

Evening Session.—The Committee re-assembled at 4 o'clock, and remained in session, discussing the River and Harbor Bill till nine, when it was, and the House adjourned.

On the 28th, Mr. Clingman presented additional documents in support of an act relative to a tract of land granted to the Military Academy at West Point.

Mr. Clingman moved that the Military Academy Bill be taken up.

Mr. Hunter objected to the motion, stating that he had a bill which it was desirable to have passed before the session closed, and which would require but a few minutes' consideration.

Mr. Clingman withdrew his motion, and the bill was taken up, and, after a few remarks by Messrs. Clingman and Hunter, was laid aside.

A bill for the relief of the heirs of Sullivan, Iowa, was taken up and passed. Adjourned.

On the 21st, other petitions had been presented, and, Mr. Clarke offered a resolution, calling for information respecting the operations by the commissioners appointed to run the boundary line between the United States and Mexico.

Mr. Wade introduced a bill for the improvement of, and establishment of a line of settlements along the emigrant route to Oregon.

Mr. Seward offered a resolution, which was agreed to, calling for information relative to the claim of the State Department, by foreign governments, respecting the reduction of ocean postage.

Mr. Houston moved to take up Mr. King's bill, granting land for the benefit of the indigent insane. Lost—Yeas 17, nays 32.

Mr. Smith moved that a resolution of the House, fixing the day for adjournment, be taken up. He was afraid of expense the session would otherwise incur. The motion to take up was lost, and the Deficiency Bill was taken up. The Senate then took a recess, when the question was stated, and passed some minor votes, in order to insert the words "the sum of," before the word "two," and to strike out the words "and the Indian Department," and to insert "Indian Department, including the expenses of the Utah Indian Treaty." Mr. Hunter moved to amend the bill by striking out the appropriation of $50,000 for the pay and mileage of Agents to treat with the Indians. Mr. Hunter's motion was agreed to. Mr. Mason opposed a Committee on Conference.

On motion of Mr. Gwin the Senate went into Executive Session, and in one hour and a half thereafter adjourned.

On the 26th, Mr. Clay and Mr. Fish presented petitions in favor of the Land Title Law.

Mr. Fish presented a petition of merchants and others, of New York, praying the recognition of the Hungarian Republic.

Mr. Jones introduced his bill for the relief of the surviving officers and soldiers of the late war with Great Britain, or, if dead, to the widows and children of any such officers or soldiers. It shall be the duty of the Collector, within whose district the name shall be found, to pay to the person entitled to receive the same, the amount of pay due to such officer or soldier, at the rate of the highest pay of which any of an unequal pay may be charged.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That this act shall not be construed to repeal, alter, or amend any act, or parts of acts, of Congress, now in force, and not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, be, and the same are hereby repealed.

The Bill also provides that claimants, dye wood, &c., may, at the option of the claimant, be sold at auction, and not subjected to the Compromise Commissioners.

The resolution for the purchase of Catlin's collection of paintings was taken up.

Mr. Stewart spoke at length in favor of the resolution. At the conclusion of his remarks, the resolution to purchase Catlin's collection was laid over from Friday.

Mr. Stewart moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill, granting to the States, for the purposes of draining the swamp lands, the right of way through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 29th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 30th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 31st, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 1st, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 2d, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 3d, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 4th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 5th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 6th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 7th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 8th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 9th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 10th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 11th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 12th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 13th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 14th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 15th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 16th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 17th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 18th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 19th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 20th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 21st, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 22d, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 23d, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 24th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 25th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 26th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 27th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 28th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 29th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 30th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 31st, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 1st, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 2d, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 3d, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 4th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 5th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 6th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 7th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 8th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 9th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 10th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 11th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 12th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 13th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 14th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 15th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a bill granting the right of way, through the public lands in all unappropriated public road and railroad companies.

Mr. Stanly moved that the House recede from its disagreement, and this was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 59. So the bill passed, and received the President's signature to become a law.

Mr. Fowler asked leave to introduce a resolution to appoint the same members with the same kind and number of books which the old ones have received, pending which proposition the House adjourned.

On the 16th, the House met at 11 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of a Selected Poetry.

THE ANGELS.

BY DOUGLAS.

Angel of Hope.

I hear my mother's voice,
Though the night is dark and drear,
Oh, there wings are hanging heavily,
As if the silver cord were near.
Tell me, shall you follow me?
Whereon and wherefore journey we then?

Angel of Suffering.

I smile—OH, I smile,
From the bitter realm,
Where tears are death,
Where sweet Consolation—
Where the last voice the Passion hath heard—
Hath fled—and will be mute,
And weary feet have ceased to roam
With sleep, continuing pain,
Till with the cross which Jesus bore,
Are lifted on Heaven of Calvary,
Pentecostal flames, and burnishing rills,
And cross with hearts of love,
Leaping their mortal digital dew,
Filling their hearts to fervent prayer—
Saying in truth, with heart of faith,
As the royal Psalm'ist said?
Kneels in mighty, and such hath room
For millions of souls sublime!
Heaven's smiles, and supreme bliss,
And holds for ever with same;
And yet there remain the Father's dowry,
And the Lord Pleges, and the penitent meek,
Or Infant's best defence?

Angel of Hope.

Heaven beholds—Heaven beholds—
Through the clouds may darkly frown;
Heaven fills the poor and wretched—
Heaven brings the mighty down!
Trust in Heaven, suffering angel—
Through the cross shall come the crown!

Angel of Suffering.

I have been to the darkened tomb
Where Affliction's infant dwells—
Its cradle is the bed of death—
Its pillow is the breast of clay—
From birth to manhood—
But joy not mine!
From their cradles to their graves?
Children with withered hearts,
And children with never a mother's chaos—
Yielding and dying all life departs,
Living and dying without an aim,
Living forever to labor and labor,
Leaving their tasks with horrible words—
Wringing with heathen, and struggling with sculptors.

Angel of Hope.

Heaven is mighty! and God is good!
Links of love is understood!
To cement the love
Of Beauty and Power—
Channels the glorious day—
When Night shall be Night, and Darkness Light,
And Wrong to cease away.

Selected Articles.

THE SCHOOLMASTER'S USE OF WORDS.

FROM "PARIS IN THE SEVEN BY WOLSE."

NO. II.

This exercise of putting words in their true relation and connection with one another might be carried much further. We might take whole groups of words, which seem to us at first sight to acknowledge hardly any kinship. If indeed any, with one another, and yet with no great difficulty and study they had a common parentage and descent. For instance, here are the words "chair," "chairs," "chairs," "chairmen," "chaired," "chaired," they all are derived from one Anglo-Saxon word, which signifies to separate or divide, and still exists with us in the shape of "to shear," which made once the three parts, or shares, in England, as it is separated from the rest; a "share" is a portion of anything thus divided off; "shears" are instruments effecting this process of separation; the "chare" is the piece where the continuity of the land is interrupted or separated by the sea; a "shred" is that which is "sheared" or shorn from the main piece; a "shard" or a piece of shard, of that which is broken off and thus divided from the vessel; and those which I have addressed by no means exhaust this group or family of words, though it would take more time than I can spare to put some other words in relation with it.

But this analyzing of groups of words for the detecting of the kind of relationship between them, and the one root out of which they all grow, is a process which may require more etymological knowledge than you possess, and more helps from books than you can always expect to command. There is another process, and one which may prove to less useful to yourselves and to others, which will lie more certainly within your reach. It will often happen that you will meet in books, sometimes in the same book, and perhaps in the same page of this book, a word used in senses so far apart from one another, that it will seem to you at first sight, almost absurd to assume possible that there can be any bond of connection between them. How when you do then fall in with a word employed in two or more senses seemingly far removed from one another, assumes yourselves to seek out the bond which there certainly is between these several uses. This tracing of that which is common to and connects all its meanings, can of course only be done by getting to its heart, to the nucleus of meaning which, as I said, is often a fruitful seed, all the others unfold themselves; to the first link in the chain, from which every later one, in a direct line or a lateral, depends. And we may proceed in this investigation, certain that we shall find such, or at least that such there is to be found. For this is one of that's with us being filled above all doubt (and the non-recognition of it is the great fault in Johnson's Dictionary), that a word has originally but one meaning, and that all the others, however widely they may diverge from one another and seem to recede from this one, may yet be affiliated upon it, may be brought back to the one central meaning, which gave and knits them all together; just as the races of man, black, white, and red, despite of all their present diversity and dispersion, have a central point of unity in their first parents.

Let me illustrate what I mean by two or three familiar examples. Here is the word "post;" how various are the senses in which it is employed; "post"-office; "post"-horse; a "post" standing in the ground; a military "post;" an official "post;" "to post" a ledger. Might one not at first presume it impossible to bring all these uses of "post" to a common centre? Yet, indeed, when once on the right track, nothing is easier; "post" is the Latin "positus," that which is placed; the place of timber is "placed" in the ground, and so a "post;" a military station is a "post," for a man is "placed" in it, and must not quit it without orders; to travel "post," is to have certain relays of horses "placed" at intervals, so that no delay on the road may occur; the "post"-office is that which avails itself of this mode of communication; to "post" a ledger is to "place" or register its several items.

Or take the word "stock," in what an almost infinite number of senses it is employed; we have live "stock," "stock" in trade, the village "stocks," the "stock" of a gun, the "stock" dove, the "stocks" on which ships are built, the "stock" which goes round the neck, the family "stock," the "stocks," in public funds, in which money is invested, and other "stocks," very likely, besides these. What point in common can we find between them all? This, that they are all derived from, and were originally the past participle of "to stick," which, as it now makes "stuck," made formerly "stock;" and they cohere in the idea of fastness, which it common to every one. Thus, the "stock" of a gun is that in which the barrel is fixed; the village "stocks," are those in which the feet are fastened; the "stock" in trade, is the fund capital; and so, too, the "stock" on the farm, although the fixity of capital has there taken the shape of horses and cattle; in the "stocks," or public funds, money sticks fast, inasmuch as those who place it there cannot withdraw or demand the capital, but receive only the interest; the "stock" of a tree is fast set in the ground; and from this one of the most it is transferred to a family; the "stock," or "stirps," to that from which it grows, and out of which it stands itself. And here we may bring in the "stock," dove, as being the "stock," or "stirps," of the domestic kinds. I might grow with these, or rather, in both its spellings; a "stake" in the hedge is stuck and fixed there; the "stake" in the wager against the issue of a race, are paid down, and there fixed or deposited to answer the event; a head" "stuck" in a piece of meat or stuck about it can be stuck on the point of a fork; who much more of the same kind.

How often does the word "quick," in the sound, perplex children; and even after they have learned that it is the quick and the dead" means the living and dead, they know it really so long; for they fail to put this "quick" in any connection with the "quick" of their own resolution, the "quick" with which they feel they shudder to throw up the ball, or that "quick" we bathe when, our mind, that is the living flesh, when we have cut the nail too close. Here, however, we may come to assist them in the discovery of the connection between this and the other uses of the word, "quick," and in this, by primary meaning, it is that which is "alive;" the quick and the dead, that is, the living and the dead; "quick" is, in fact, a participle, though not a participle of any verb now in use, but of a verb which was once in use, and which is preserved in its cognates, whether briefly or amply; thus a "quick" quitch; and so, too, a "quick" quick; and so, too, "quicken," "quickness," "quicksilver," "quicksand," and "quick" orchard among the "Hundreds," and "quick" hedge, and "quick" set hedge, and "Quicks," and "Quicksets."

Sometimes a slightly different spelling comes in aid of an unnatural divergence of meanings, to disguise the fact of two words having originally sound or time but the same etymology, and really being an identity related to one another, they in no way are. In this way one word "heir" comes to be spelled "heir" and the same word "air," which is a Greek word, meaning "a rule or law, by which we try other things, and is in reverting use, the Holy Scriptures, as being regulations of life and doctrine in the church. But the carpenter's rule was commonly a wood (cimon), that being selected on account of its straightness; you may remember in Sedgwick's wooden one or other being made of the unswerving "wood" (Rev. xxi., 15, 16); and from the rule or "canon," the rule or line (for "canon") had its name, or at any rate the words are most closely allied. A word, however, as we all know, besides being used in many senses, is often in different senses when the farthest baptized or use, one was from artillery, were invented, and were feeling about for their appropriate names, since one sooner at least than that which the rural supplied, and they were called "cannon," too."

When it is then said that we can always trace the different meanings in which a word is employed, to some one sense from which these all immediately or mediately proceed, that no word has primarily more than one meaning, it must be remembered that it is quite possible there may in two words pronounced and even spelled exactly alike, which yet are wholly different in their derivation and primary usage; and that a word may be brought back to its true central meaning, which perhaps you have heard. The gentleman alluded to took his stand or stood over a wharf, under which the tide flowed and flowed, and in the floor was a trap-door, used for various purposes, and through which he was accustomed to let down a line to catch a fish now and then for private dinner. One day, having to attend a conference, he was surprised to see many go to it and found it empty. This led him to watch her, when presently a fish caught hold, and mistress Grimalkin immediately commenced hauling in the line with one paw, securing the catch hooked in by placing the other upon it as fast as hooked it. In this way she at last succeeded in the fish. After that, said my friend, I baited the hook and let her fish for herself, and henceforth have seen her catch her own dinner.

BENEVOLENCE AND GRATITUDE.

A TRUE STORY.

It was a raw, blustry night; the rain was falling fast, and the streets were almost deserted. A Frenchman's night-cap was out of the question for one of the town to attempt human. The cold and unusual darkness effectually discouraged to enjoy the comforts of a blazing fire, or peril on to take refreshment.

"Will you give a poor fellow a night's shelter in your hay-loft?" cried a wretched-looking man, as he knocked at the window of a miserable-looking hut.

"If so, not to such urgent," answered the man; "you had better quite the host of your way off, or you'll get more than you bust for, if you don't shout here any longer."

"Perhaps, young man," replied the lad, "you may one day be very glad to get such a night's lodging yourself, and then you'll be more humane unless; and as to losing, I have rather than to take what is not my own, if I had not a shoe to my foot."

"I wouldn't trust you further than I could see you, add the sailor;" and if you don't be off I'll make you."

Poor Jack was turning away, hungry and disheartened, when he felt a hand on the shoulder by a lad who called on stable boy.

"If you were to go down the road to the first little cheap you come to," he said, "Widow Smith would, I dare say, let you sleep in her wood-house; she is a good old creature, and is always ready to help any one in distress."

"Thank you, thank you," said the sailor.

The lad gratefully entered a cottage, and failing in the house of the forlorn stranger; they told him that there still were hearts in which kindness flowed.

John Willis on seeing others, had been robbed of his little all—a thing of no uncommon occurrence—and he was now compelled to beg his way to London. He deeply felt the misfortune he had met with. The darkness of the position frequently produces it hard for those who are really in need, to get help, for their boldness in very frequently questioned.

Jack entered the dilapidated grove him; but he found the shop closed. He felt that it was an unseemly hour; still the miserable appearance of the hut had not deterred the unfortunate lad to beg gently at the door. His summons was answered by the wealthy dame, who, having listened comparatively to his tale of suffering, bade him enter and share his frugal meal. The lad entertained his benevolent host with a recital of some of the disputes he had had with a contest of arms of the deputies himself had. And she gently directed his mind to the good Providence which had preserved him to the present hour, and the Saviour who had died to redeem him. The repast over, the widow placed some clean dry straw in one corner of a shed attached to her dwelling, and with a thankful heart the wearied traveller stretched himself upon it, and slept as soundly as if on a bed of down.

Before continuing his journey in the morning, Jack looked in to thank the good woman for the shelter she had given him; he found, however, a warm meal awaiting him. Having partaken of it and accepted a few cents to help him on his way, he departed with a hearty benediction from his benefactress.

Ten years passed, and the little incident here recorded had long escaped the memory of all save one of the parties concerned. Ten years had wrought many changes in the town and most of its inhabitants; but they had glided gently over the head of Widow Smith. The only alteration perceptible in her was, that her hair had become more silvery, and her form was now slightly bent. She still combined her labors of love; and though her means were very limited, she was looked upon as the friend and neighbor of all who were sick or in want.

One morning, a large official-looking letter was put into Mrs. Smith's hand by the postman. Its purport was to beg her attendance in London, on the following day, when the writer said she would receive gratifying intelligence, which it was wished to communicate to herself personally. Much conjecture and guessing passed in the mind of the widow during that and the succeeding day; but at length, on the evening of the second day, she found herself in the London coach, and in due time was set down at the door of the mansion of Sir Henry Ellerton, who had heard of the humane conduct of the widow to the shipwrecked sailor, and had sought her out, that he might reward her for her kindness.

"Will you give a poor fellow a night's shelter in your hay-loft?" cried a wretched-looking man, as he knocked at the window of a miserable-looking hut.

"If so, not to such urgent," answered the man; "you had better quite the host of your way off, or you'll get more than you bust for, if you don't shout here any longer."

"Perhaps, young man," replied the lad, "you may one day be very glad to get such a night's lodging yourself, and then you'll be more humane unless; and as to losing, I have rather than to take what is not my own, if I had not a shoe to my foot."

"I wouldn't trust you further than I could see you, add the sailor;" and if you don't be off I'll make you."

Poor Jack was turning away, hungry and disheartened, when he felt a hand on the shoulder by a lad who called on stable boy.

"If you were to go down the road to the first little cheap you come to," he said, "Widow Smith would, I dare say, let you sleep in her wood-house; she is a good old creature, and is always ready to help any one in distress."

"Thank you, thank you," said the sailor.

The lad gratefully entered a cottage, and failing in the house of the forlorn stranger; they told him that there still were hearts in which kindness flowed.

John Willis on seeing others, had been robbed of his little all—a thing of no uncommon occurrence—and he was now compelled to beg his way to London. He deeply felt the misfortune he had met with. The darkness of the position frequently produces it hard for those who are really in need, to get help, for their boldness in very frequently questioned.

Jack entered the dilapidated grove him; but he found the shop closed. He felt that it was an unseemly hour; still the miserable appearance of the hut had not deterred the unfortunate lad to beg gently at the door. His summons was answered by the wealthy dame, who, having listened comparatively to his tale of suffering, bade him enter and share his frugal meal. The lad entertained his benevolent host with a recital of some of the disputes he had had with a contest of arms of the deputies himself had. And she gently directed his mind to the good Providence which had preserved him to the present hour, and the Saviour who had died to redeem him. The repast over, the widow placed some clean dry straw in one corner of a shed attached to her dwelling, and with a thankful heart the wearied traveller stretched himself upon it, and slept as soundly as if on a bed of down.

Before continuing his journey in the morning, Jack looked in to thank the good woman for the shelter she had given him; he found, however, a warm meal awaiting him. Having partaken of it and accepted a few cents to help him on his way, he departed with a hearty benediction from his benefactress.

Ten years passed, and the little incident here recorded had long escaped the memory of all save one of the parties concerned. Ten years had wrought many changes in the town and most of its inhabitants; but they had glided gently over the head of Widow Smith. The only alteration perceptible in her was, that her hair had become more silvery, and her form was now slightly bent. She still combined her labors of love; and though her means were very limited, she was looked upon as the friend and neighbor of all who were sick or in want.

One morning, a large official-looking letter was put into Mrs. Smith's hand by the postman. Its purport was to beg her attendance in London, on the following day, when the writer said she would receive gratifying intelligence, which it was wished to communicate to herself personally. Much conjecture and guessing passed in the mind of the widow during that and the succeeding day; but at length, on the evening of the second day, she found herself in the London coach, and in due time was set down at the door of the mansion of Sir Henry Ellerton, who had heard of the humane conduct of the widow to the shipwrecked sailor, and had sought her out, that he might reward her for her kindness.

FERN LEAVES.

BY FANNY FERN.

FANNY'S BOUQUET.

Oh! what a dreadful thing it is to be a woman, to be seen, as much a day as yesterday; to feel Watteau-ish to the ends of your little fingers; to feel the spirit moving you to give one good, hearty, vicarious shaking; to feel, in short, as if and have to sit still, and simper, and wave a little fluttering wig of a pocket handkerchief!! O-o-h! Then—to go to Gibbons and select his very best bouquet; to attach a card with a few charitable words; to borrow you neighbor's prettiest child, to put her silly out the door, (hiding behind it yourself;) to see her lifted into the carriage, and remember a little bit of Sweet Betsy (which you steal from her lips, red-hot five minutes after!) to see your bouquet in close juxtapositive, with the face that should be Degarreotyped on the heart of every American; and then—when he leaves his flower-crowned carriage to speedify, to see the person who has charge of it, after growing facetious over a bottle of wine that he only drove you under the sun, to make you a present of a bouquet, figuratively, my success or ruin to suit the bend which there certainly is between these several uses. This tracing of that which is common to and connects all its meanings, can of course only be done by getting to its heart, to the nucleus of meaning which, as I said, is often a fruitful seed, all the others unfold themselves; to the first link in the chain, from which every later one, in a direct line or a lateral, depends. And we may proceed in this investigation, certain that we shall find such, or at least that such there is to be found. For this is one of that's with us being filled above all doubt (and the non-recognition of it is the great fault in Johnson's Dictionary), that a word has originally but one meaning, and that all the others, however widely they may diverge from one another and seem to recede from this one, may yet be affiliated upon it, may be brought back to the one central meaning, which gave and knits them all together; just as the races of man, black, white, and red, despite of all their present diversity and dispersion, have a central point of unity in their first parents.

Let me illustrate what I mean by two or three familiar examples. Here is the word "post;" how various are the senses in which it is employed; "post"-office; "post"-horse; a "post" standing in the ground; a military "post;" an official "post;" "to post" a ledger. Might one not at first presume it impossible to bring all these uses of "post" to a common centre? Yet, indeed, when once on the right track, nothing is easier; "post" is the Latin "positus," that which is placed; the place of timber is "placed" in the ground, and so a "post;" a military station is a "post," for a man is "placed" in it, and must not quit it without orders; to travel "post," is to have certain relays of horses "placed" at intervals, so that no delay on the road may occur; the "post"-office is that which avails itself of this mode of communication; to "post" a ledger is to "place" or register its several items.

Or take the word "stock," in what an almost infinite number of senses it is employed; we have live "stock," "stock" in trade, the village "stocks," the "stock" of a gun, the "stock" dove, the "stocks" on which ships are built, the "stock" which goes round the neck, the family "stock," the "stocks," in public funds, in which money is invested, and other "stocks," very likely, besides these. What point in common can we find between them all? This, that they are all derived from, and were originally the past participle of "to stick," which, as it now makes "stuck," made formerly "stock;" and they cohere in the idea of fastness, which it common to every one. Thus, the "stock" of a gun is that in which the barrel is fixed; the village "stocks," are those in which the feet are fastened; the "stock" in trade, is the fund capital; and so, too, the "stock" on the farm, although the fixity of capital has there taken the shape of horses and cattle; in the "stocks," or public funds, money sticks fast, inasmuch as those who place it there cannot withdraw or demand the capital, but receive only the interest; the "stock" of a tree is fast set in the ground; and from this one of the most it is transferred to a family; the "stock," or "stirps," to that from which it grows, and out of which it stands itself. And here we may bring in the "stock" dove, as being the "stock," or "stirps," of the domestic kinds. I might grow with these, or rather, in both its spellings; a "stake" in the hedge is stuck and fixed there; the "stake" in the wager against the issue of a race, are paid down, and there fixed or deposited to answer the event; a head" "stuck" in a piece of meat or stuck about it can be stuck on the point of a fork; who much more of the same kind.

How often does the word "quick," in the sound, perplex children; and even after they have learned that it is the quick and the dead" means the living and dead, they know it really so long; for they fail to put this "quick" in any connection with the "quick" of their own resolution, the "quick" with which they feel they shudder to throw up the ball, or that "quick" we bathe when, our mind, that is the living flesh, when we have cut the nail too close. Here, however, we may come to assist them in the discovery of the connection between this and the other uses of the word, "quick," and in this, by primary meaning, it is that which is "alive;" the quick and the dead, that is, the living and the dead; "quick" is, in fact, a participle, though not a participle of any verb now in use, but of a verb which was once in use, and which is preserved in its cognates, whether briefly or amply; thus a "quick" quitch; and so, too, a "quick" quick; and so, too, "quicken," "quickness," "quicksilver," "quicksand," and "quick" orchard among the "Hundreds," and "quick" hedge, and "quick" set hedge, and "Quicks," and "Quicksets."

Sometimes a slightly different spelling comes in aid of an unnatural divergence of meanings, to disguise the fact of two words having originally sound or time but the same etymology, and really being an identity related to one another, they in no way are. In this way one word "heir" comes to be spelled "heir" and the same word "air," which is a Greek word, meaning "a rule or law, by which we try other things, and is in reverting use, the Holy Scriptures, as being regulations of life and doctrine in the church. But the carpenter's rule was commonly a wood (cimon), that being selected on account of its straightness; you may remember in Sedgwick's wooden one or other being made of the unswerving "wood" (Rev. xxi., 15, 16); and from the rule or "canon," the rule or line (for "canon") had its name, or at any rate the words are most closely allied. A word, however, as we all know, besides being used in many senses, is often in different senses when the farthest baptized or use, one was from artillery, were invented, and were feeling about for their appropriate names, since one sooner at least than that which the rural supplied, and they were called "cannon," too."

When it is then said that we can always trace the different meanings in which a word is employed, to some one sense from which these all immediately or mediately proceed, that no word has primarily more than one meaning, it must be remembered that it is quite possible there may in two words pronounced and even spelled exactly alike, which yet are wholly different in their derivation and primary usage; and that a word may be brought back to its true central meaning, which perhaps you have heard. The gentleman alluded to took his stand or stood over a wharf, under which the tide flowed and flowed, and in the floor was a trap-door, used for various purposes, and through which he was accustomed to let down a line to catch a fish now and then for private dinner. One day, having to attend a conference, he was surprised to see many go to it and found it empty. This led him to watch her, when presently a fish caught hold, and mistress Grimalkin immediately commenced hauling in the line with one paw, securing the catch hooked in by placing the other upon it as fast as hooked it. In this way she at last succeeded in the fish. After that, said my friend, I baited the hook and let her fish for herself, and henceforth have seen her catch her own dinner.

* In confirmation of this view of the derivation of "chamber," and in proof that it lay very near to the surface in the mind of the people, I may refer to the application of "Kahr" in German, which, at first signifying a cave or vault, has in like manner been applied to the barrel of a gun.

FANNY TALKETH SENSE.

"There is nothing," said Sir Samuel Romilly, "by which I have more profited than by the just observations, the good opinion and the sincere and gentle encouragement of an amiable and excellent woman."

Oh, Sir Romilly! Sir Romilly! who has made such a fool of you? Didn't you write that within sight of the brass knocker? or have you just received your certificate for a "straight ticket?" You've immortalized yourself for a donkey forever! However, it's a harmless type—you won't feel it much, and you've got her here! Hasn't everything been done to ameliorate the condition of women? and what had it all amounted to? Did you ever hear of a female author or poet? Don't the children inherit all the smartness from their fathers? Don't they have the most to do in forming their characters? Great nations have been ruled to have "talented mothers;" women have been said "to control the fate of empires;" but it never has been said by just such another, unmitigated simpleton as yourself! "Just observations of sensible women!" who believes that but you? No, sir—we are perfectly sensible that we are only a superior kind of earning outang, (fond of chattering and playing tricks.) It was very natural in you, that bit of satire! You never should "tell upon facts," or reason. I heard somebody say, the other day, "that no man in a gentleman who would insult the SPEAKER of his species," (that's us! you know!) "Never think a dead lion." Sir Romilly! you shouldn't laugh! Now here's an author who understands a thing or two. He says:

"If you wish to be a favorite of the girls, generally, attend to their wants; that is, give them rides, candy, and raisins."

That's it! We should be just as contented as clams, with such an exclusive millionaire! but if you've any regard for your reputation, for mercy's sake don't ask "a woman's advice" about anything; you might as well ask a six weeks old kitten! "Go ahead," my dear fellow, on your own RESPONSIBILITY; a MAN can't make a MISTAKE!! (You ought to lose your title, for being such a double distilled fool!) I hope Harmon will find you! I'll take a "cannon ticket."—Olive Branch.

A correspondent of the Portland Transcript tells a story quite as large as we can swallow:

He recollects an anecdote that was told many years ago by a gentleman of Eastport, respecting a certain sea captain who, perhaps you have heard. The gentleman alluded to took his stand or stood over a wharf, under which the tide flowed and flowed, and in the floor was a trap-door, used for various purposes, and through which he was accustomed to let down a line to catch a fish now and then for private dinner. One day, having to attend a conference, he was surprised to see many go to it and found it empty. This led him to watch her, when presently a fish caught hold, and mistress Grimalkin immediately commenced hauling in the line with one paw, securing the catch hooked in by placing the other upon it as fast as hooked it. In this way she at last succeeded in the fish. After that, said my friend, I baited the hook and let her fish for herself, and henceforth have seen her catch her own dinner.

Traveling Scene.

MR. VERIGREEN GIVING INSTRUCTIONS TO THE FIREMAN.

Mr. Verigreen, being about to take his honeymoon trip, after having sealed his letter in the safe, gave forward and assists the fireman as follows:—

"Harry, Mister Engineer, I want yeou to be very heedful, and go slow, cause yeou see I've just been married, and my wife and I are goin' on to this 'ere train."

Wit and Humor.

CURIOUS DECEPTION.

A gentleman from Paris online the following: I saw through one of the windows of the Hôpet's Orbeo, in the twelfth arrondissement, what seemed to be the body of a negro hanging by the neck. At the first glance, and even at the second, I took it for a human being, whom disappointed love, or perhaps an expeditious Judge, had disposed of in methody; but I soon found that the many persons in question was only a large doll, as large as life.

What to think of this I did not know, so I asked the door-keeper the meaning of it.

"This is the Centralized Museum," was the answer; and on my showing a curiosity to examine it, he was kind enough to act as my showman.

In a large dirty room we ascitened over the floor, on the walls, and along the ceiling, all the inventions of roguery which had been confiscated from time to time, by those guardians of the law, the revenue officers.

It is a complete arsenal of the weapons of smuggling; all, unfortunately in complete confidence.

Look before you; there is a hogshead drawed up as a mouse, with a child that holds two quarts and a half. On the other side are logs hollow as the Trojan horse, and filled with semina of negare. On the floor lies a huge box constructor, gorged with China silks; and just beyond it a pile of coal curiously perforated with a spade of cotton.

The natural gentleman who exalted my sympathy at first, met with his fate under the following circumstances: He was built of tin, painted black, and stood like a haydock or Ethiopian shower on the foot-board of a carriage, fastened by his feet and hands. He had frequently passed through the gates, and each time, by using the old trick; another said it would be highly imprudent for a woman of her years to take such a journey, especially to trust herself alone in such a wicked place as London; while a third was quite sure that the writer had some evil design. It did appear a little strange that a lady residing so near should have stayed her mother from her native place. The widow's credulity had often been imposed upon, yet she would believe anything but that any one would intentionally deceive or wrong her. She had great confidence, too, in the protecting providence of God, whom she served in humble obedience on His ground in Christ; and therefore felt no fear in complying with the request in the letter. Therefore, notwithstanding the ridicule of some, and the remonstrances of others, the good dame started by the first coach which passed through on the morrow, and reached London in time to meet the appointment.

The address given her was at an inn, and on arriving there she was immediately ushered into a private apartment, where two respectable looking men were awaiting to receive her. The widow's surprise was increased when one of them accosted her with the familiar phrase,

"How do you do, mother? Don't you remember me, my worthy?" added he, in order to jog her half-frightened inquiring glances.

"I am Jack Willis, the sailor you housed and fed ten years ago, when he had neither money nor friends. I am now Captain of a merchantman; and this gentleman," turning to his companion, "will, in my name, do the needful to settle an annuity of fifty pounds upon you, as a proof of my gratitude for your kindness, and especially for your good advice, which I hope, by God's mercy, led me to think of Christ, and to trust in Him for salvation."

The widow, unable to give utterance to the emotions of her swelling heart, burst into tears.

Widow Smith returned to her cottage home, thankful to God for His blessing on her humble efforts to benefit a human creature in body and soul, and for his bountiful care for her, and delighted that she had now increased means of usefulness; and never after did she listen to a tale of suffering without thinking of poor Jack Willis.

A BROKEN HEART.—The interesting case of a literary broken heart we subjoin, was related by Mr. K. J. Mitchel, of Jefferson College, Philadelphia, while lecturing upon the diseases of the heart. It will be seen that the expression "broken-hearted" is not merely figurative:

"In the early part of his medical career, Dr. H. accompanied, as surgeon, a packet that sailed between Liverpool and one of our Southern ports. On the return voyage, soon after leaving Liverpool, while the doctor and the captain of the vessel, a weather-beaten son of Neptune, but possessed of uncommonly fine feelings and strong impulses, were conversing in the latter's state-room, the captain produced a large chest, and carefully took out a number of articles of various descriptions, which he arranged upon the table. Dr. H., surprised at the display of costly jewels, ornaments, dresses, and all the varied paraphernalia of which ladies are naturally fond, inquired of the captain his object in having made so many valuable purchases. The sailor, in reply, said that for seven or eight years he had been devotedly attached to a lady, to whom he had several times made proposals of marriage, but was so often rejected; that her refusal to wed him, however, had only stimulated his love to a greater extention; and that, finally upon removing his office, declaring that he would be upset all his ready money, while in London, for bridal gifts. After gazing at them fondly for some time, and remarking on them in turn, 'I think this will please Annie,' and 'I am sure she will like that,' he replaced them with the utmost care. This ceremony he repeated every day during the voyage; and the doctor often observed a tear glistening in his eye, as he spoke of the pleasure he would have in presenting them to his affianced bride. On reaching his destination, the captain arrayed himself with more than usual precision, and disembarked as soon as possible, to hasten to his love. As soon as he was about to step into the carriage awaiting him, he was called aside by two gentlemen who desired to have a communication, the purport of which was that the lady had proved unfaithful to the trust reposed in her, and had married another, with whom she had decamped shortly before. Instantly the captain was observed to clap his hand to his breast, and fall heavily to the ground. He was taken up, and conveyed to his room on the vessel. Dr. H. was immediately summoned; but before he reached the poor captain, he was dead. A post-mortem examination revealed the cause of his unfortunate disease. His heart was found literally torn in twain! The tremendous propulsion of the blood, consequent upon such a violent nervous shock, forced the powerful muscular organ asunder, and life was at an end. The heart was broken."

HEINZ VON STEIN.

FROM THE GERMAN.

Out rode from the wild, dark forest,
The terrible Heinz von Stein;
He paused at the door of a tavern,
And gazed at the weeping sign.

His mail-coat of iron is a-rust,
And grawled for a bottle of wine;
Up comes, with a flask and a corkscrew,
A maiden of beauty divine.

Then he sighed, with a deep love-longing,
And said, "Oh, damsel mine,
Suppose you just give a few kisses
To the valorous Ritter von Stein."

And she answered, "The kissing business
Is entirely out of my line;
And I'd simply not say how it is
Or a commoner ugly as thine!"

Oh, then the bold knight was angry,
And cursed both corsets and flax;
And called her how much was the eyetails
For her sour and musty wine.

And directly he rode to his castle,
And sat himself down to dine.
And this is the dreadful legend
Of the terrible Heinz von Stein!

BOB AND HIS PROPERTY.—Bob was a singular sort of genius, but not half so singular as his two ponies; they were cautious of singular habits, singular in their looks, and both of them were as contrary as their master was crazy. If Bob was hard to catch, the ponies wouldn't budge an inch. If one found a bone, the other would snarl and snap until the bone had disappeared.

One of the aforesaid ponies had been presented with the name of "Nick," and was considered by his master to be "the biggest fool or a dog I ever need."

One morning the dog started a fox, and away they went, fox, dog and Bob—the two former in a very short space of time leaving Bob in the lurch, clear out of sight. Bob, however, followed on, and presently came to a wood-shopper, whom he immediately questioned.

"How you need a fox go by here?"

"What, yes."

"How you need a dog go by here?"

"What, yes—they was runnin' like blazes."

"How was they?"

"Why, about side and tumble—lay a kinds ahind?"

Bob obeyed, and gave the dog up as a bad one.

☞ A poet carried some verses to a critic, and desired his opinion of their merits. After reading them, the critic observed: "My dear sir, those lines need fire." And he threw them into the grate.

Extracts from Books

THE GOLDEN CROSS OF KOROSPO.

Korosdo had grown the richest village in the county of Saros. The gold and silver mines of the neighborhood yielded much splendid revenue, that every inhabitant of the village possessed a polished chest. Right cross, and pine houses, stood in every grade. The shop-sides of the poorest was fastened with golden hooks. The buttons of his time jacket were of the purest silver. Golden spurs clanked on his boots. The large linen sleeves of the youngsters were trimmed with precious lace. The maidens adorned themselves with silver wreaths. The women wore golden caps. Silver spoons and plates were to be seen on the shelves of their kitchens; they drank their imperial Tokay in golden cups. The blessing of Heaven thus richly manifested itself upon the peasants of Korosdo. But they likewise proved deserving; for the treasures they won on the sweat of their brows were employed to the benefit of their brethren. No beggar was seen in the whole neighborhood. Whoever wanted work, got profitable labor; and whoever proved unequal to it, was placed in the hospital, and was nursed with provident care.

Raising a worthy monument of their thanksgiving to the Dispenser of all bounties, they erected a large stone church, and on its steeple they placed a globe of beaten gold, so large that a quarter of wheat could hardly have filled it; and upon the globe they fixed a cross of massive gold, two fathoms high. One day, however, had escaped their attention—regard for the education of their children. It is true that they got them the most costly teachers of languages and philosophy, of dancing and music. The boys and girls knew every place, from the cedar to the hyssop; but they were taught to work. The generation which had explained the miraculous silence died away, and their descendants had only learnt to enjoy, not to earn. They grew luxurious and selfish: loud songs and many fiddles deafened the ear to every other interest; feasting went on from morning to night. Beggars hovered round the houses of the wealthy, desiring to be fed with the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table. But it was not a tender cause for less fortunate brethren that concealed this help to the poor; it was the selfish motive "to get rid of the beggar," which granted momentary support, and neglected the supply of lasting wants. The number of claims increased daily, and many a pang of widowed hearts remained unsoothed, while the money lavished by the heathenish tables of the rich peasants of Korosdo, who, no longer satisfied with the pork and beef, the veal and poultry of their own yards, and with whatever bread and wine grown in their fields, purchased delicacies fetched from the towns. One family vied with another. Every one feared utilizing fasteners, who occasioned disputes and hatred.

As none of the inhabitants worked during the week, none of them felt the blessing of Sunday's repose, which leads to the grateful attendance on divine service. The church soon remained deserted, and nobody listened to the sacred sermons of the old clergyman; and when he died, the peasants resolved to elect no more preachers, but to turn the empty church into a dancing hall, which they found indispensable, as their rooms were not spacious enough for their entertainments.

The next Friday was fixed upon for a ball-feast ball, by which the sacred building was to be inaugurated for its new service. It struck on one that the appointed day was found Friday: Christian holidays had long occupied minds occupied with worldly concerns alone. Men and women, boys and girls, all met in their most costly apparel in the church, which was now the new dancing-hall. Instead of the solemnly touching sounds of the organ, the wild strains of the fiddling gipsy-band were to be heard. Unruly crowds rhumed through the nave, giddy pairs whirled around, peals of laughter were heard, and the dinner-hall was calling to abundant feasts. But a tremendous thunderclap suddenly interrupted the enjoyment; it grew dark; the earth beat asunder, and swallowed up the corrupt village with all its grossless inhabitants.—Priestly's Tales of Hungary.

LONDON SWEEPS.

The following extracts from Hayward's "London Labor and the London Poor," exhibit the state of society existing in England, as part of the great social system of mental evil:

Education.—A child, in 1850, was found in a chimney at Dunfermline, in Yorkshire, by the boy that was sweeping it. The child appeared to be about five years old. The Rev. Mr. Ellerton, of Dunfermline, who had heard of the child, and went to see him, pursued homeward by the chimney, and they could hear him scream in the chimney, and, presently, get about, being glad to part with him. "Does the child go to Sunday-school?" asked the Rev. Mr. Ellerton, of the man who had brought him; on finding a silver fork in his pocket delighted, and said, "Papa had much fairer as these." He also said the carpet in the drawing-room was like the paper; the housekeeper showed him a silver watch; he asked what sort of time—Papa's was a gold watch; he then asked when the family said, "Papa's watch is fast," or "slow," and he said, "Papa's watch always tells the right time." Mr. George Ellerton had a gold repeater; the little boy pressed the spring, and, when it struck, he jumped down the room, saying, "Papa's watch sings so." At night, when he was going to bed, he said he could not go to bed until he had said his prayers; he then repeated the Lord's Prayer almost correctly. The child had been put to sweep a chimney, that he was gathering them in his master's garden, and that the woman who sold him to the sweeper, came in and asked him if he liked selling? He said, "Yes," and she told him he should ride with her. She put him on a horse, after which they got into a vessel, and the child was put up, "and away we went." He had no recollection of his home, or where he was found, and was too young to think his father could have any other name than that of sweep. He stated whenever he heard a servant in the family at Bayeaux called George, and looked as if he expected to see his father. The child, on leaving, he said he had an uncle George, whom he loved dearly. He says his mother is dead, and it is thought his father may be abroad. From many things he says, he seems to have lived chiefly with an uncle and aunt, whom he invariably says were called Mr. and Mrs. Plumbeough. From various circumstances, it is thought he must be a native of the Continent, and probably of Germany. The child has a good countenance, and is strongly attached to his uncle